

Hospitals Urged To Establish Coronary Units

Chicago - (Science Service) - A Canadian surgeon proposes that every hospital set up facilities for emergency treatment of victims of coronary attacks.

These facilities would include two emergency rooms, and heart-specialist nurse, intern, and anesthetist.

If the attending physician were not available, this heart team would go into a cation without him.

Dr. W. Carleton Whiteside of Victoria, B.C., proposes the coronary unit in the Journal of the International College of Surgeons here. The plan is especially for victims of coronary insufficiency in which portions of the heart muscle are suddenly starved and die. A blood clot in the heart's own arteries, or hardening of these arteries, or both, can bring on this attack.

Would Use Ice Blankets

Under Dr. Whiteside's plan, a patient would be rushed to the local unit, where morphine and oxygen would be given to relieve pain and shock. Then because of the lowered output of the heart, he would be covered with ice blankets to lower his temperature.

In this modified form of suspended animation, his metabolism (living rate) would be slowed to a level his weakened heart could maintain. Dr. Whiteside said this could be kept up for several days if necessary. In extreme emergencies the patient's chest would be cut open and his heart massaged by hand.

"Not a second is to be wasted with gloves, towels and the like. We can clear up infection, but we cannot clear up permanent death," Dr. Whiteside said.

"No one will be accused of a crime for trying to restore life. Three to four minutes can mean the difference between life and death in such situations," he pointed out, adding that it would often be fatal to wait for a surgeon.
