

Tiros I Takes Cloud Photos Over Red Nations

Washington (Science Service) - In spite of the U2 incident, Tiros I has again been directed to take detailed photographs of the cloud cover over Communist China and southern Russia.

After a breakdown, the weather satellite's more detailed camera began operating again on May 10. But the National Aeronautics and Space Administration would not then say whether the camera would be used over Communist lands. NASA said only:

"We will take pictures wherever there is interesting weather."

Apparently there was "interesting weather" over the Communist countries, because it was learned here that the satellite has been programmed to photograph those areas.

NASA has insisted repeatedly that Tiros cannot take pictures of any reconnaissance value, but many observers thought NASA would not risk the satellite by photographing the two Communist countries again - especially after NASA's involvement in the U2 incident.

NASA had said the U2 was a weather flight. Later, of course, the U.S. Government admitted the plane was on a spying mission.

Tiros was launched April 1. The 270-pound satellite carries 27 cameras, one a high-resolution camera capable of photographing an area of 200-300 square miles. The second camera gives more detail, covering an area of 100 square miles.

The photographs over the Soviet Union and China apparently are to be processed. The satellite is programmed to take 100 pictures a day.

Complete Search Police Car Ride; Get It To Jail

Is a citizen, because he is a taxpayer, legally entitled to ride in a police car when he wants to?

Medford police were faced with this perplexing question Saturday night when two persons climbed in a patrol car and demanded that they be taken home.

Police said the incident occurred on Eighth st., between Front st. and Central ave., about 10:30 p.m. A policeman had patrolled the car at the curb and gotten out to investigate another case. He was standing some distance from his car when he heard the patrol car door slam.

On returning to the vehicle he found a man and a woman, later identified as John Roy Hart and Wilma Mary Hart, 601 Brookdale rd., sitting in the front seat.

When the officer asked them what they were doing, the man, according to the police officer, "demanded" a ride home.

The policeman informed the couple that he was busy on another case but would be glad to take a taxi to come and take them home.

The couple did not accept the offer, he said, but they did get out of the patrol car, one of them said that the car belonged to them because they are taxpayers and the police were supposed to take them home when they got "drunk."

Hart then stated, "I own this car as much as you do," and proceeded to hit the right rear door of the car, putting a small dent in the metal, according to the officer.

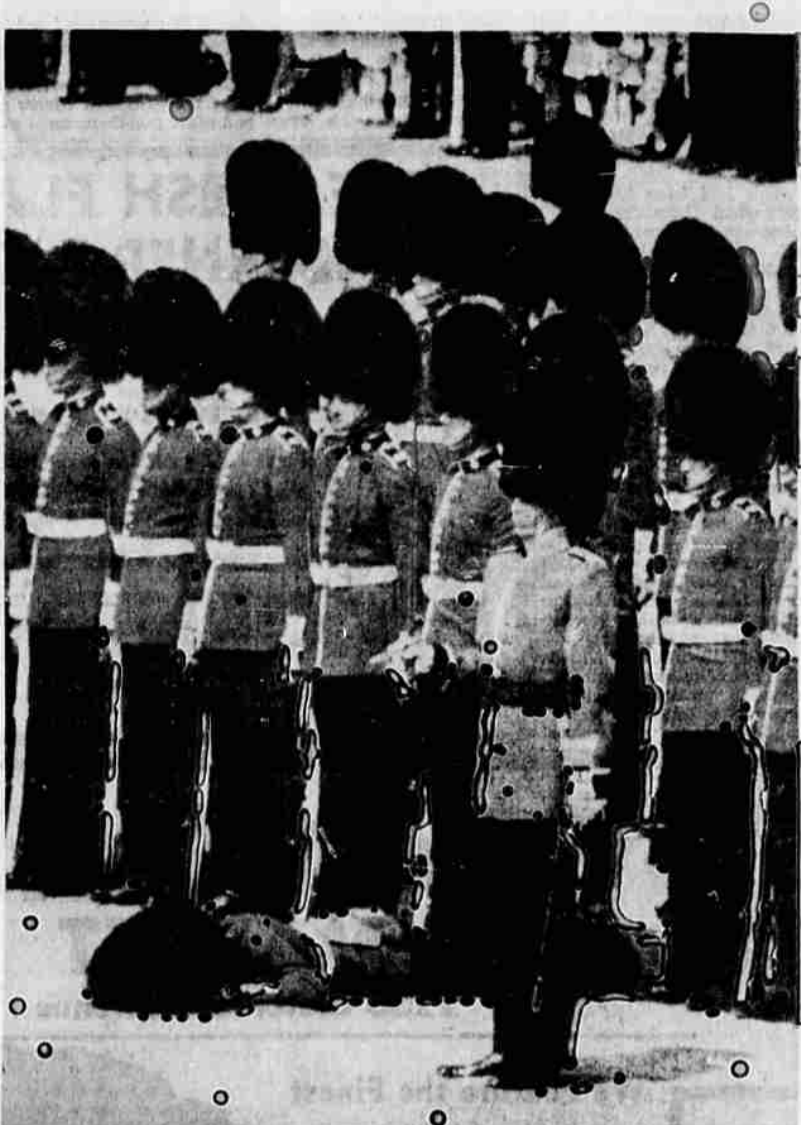

He said Mrs. Hart also joined the argument by saying it was a policeman's duty to take them home and they were going to call their lawyer.

The officer said Hart then began shouting and he placed him under arrest on a charge of disorderly conduct.

Mrs. Hart then refused to let the officer take Hart into custody and she was also placed under arrest on the same charge.

The couple finally got a ride in the police car—to the police station.

The Harts forfeited bail on disorderly conduct charges in municipal court yesterday. Bail was $25 each with $1 court costs.

Titan Expected To Receive Space Shot Assignment Soon

Cape Canaveral, Fla.—The Air Force's Titan intercontinental ballistic missile is expected to get its first space shot assignment before the end of the year.

The bullet-shaped rocket, now riding a string of six successful test flights here, probably will lift a heavy payload into orbit around earth, United Press International has learned.

"Titan could do it tomorrow," an informed source said.

The first Titan space shot won't come that early, but U.S. Military experts are known to be considering such an attempt after an advanced series of Titan military "Birds," the "J" models, are fired successfully.

The first "J" series rockets will reach the pads here in June or July.

To Boost Dyna-Soar Titan's only firm commitment for space duty at present is in the Air Force's Dyna-Soar program. The mighty rocket will begin boosting the Dyna-Soar, a space glider, within the next three years.

But Dr. Albert C. Hall, vice president of engineering for the Martin Co., builders of the Titan, revealed that the 98-foot rocket would place 2½ tons of instruments in orbit today, if asked to do so.

Various upper stages could be placed atop the two basic stages of the Titan military missile to launch a large satellite around the moon, or land a small instrumented laboratory on the lunar surface.

One possibility for Titan is the Agena, the 22-foot upper stage that ride an Atlas ICM into orbit as the Midas II "Spy-in-the-Sky" satellite last week. The 5,000-pound satellite consisted of 3,600 pounds of instruments and the Agena shell.

Titan, as a two-stage rocket, would have an advantage over the stage-and-a-half make-up of the Atlas. A Titan-launched satellite might weigh up to 11,000 pounds, of which 5,000 pounds would be working instruments. No additional upper stages would be needed for it.

Titan's weight-lifting ability would give the U.S. a chance to start matching the huge payloads of Russian satellites even before Saturn, the 1½-million-pound-thrust super-boosted comes along.

Russia's Sputnik IV, with its experimental space cabin, weighed 10,000 pounds. Earlier Soviet sputniks ranged in the four-ton area.

Hall added that modifications in Titan could more than double its payload capability. Titan could carry 300,000 pounds of thrust in its booster stage and 80,000 pounds of thrust in the second stage, which takes hold in flight after the first section is dropped away. The military model weights about 110 tons at blast-off.

Titan, whose speed reaches 17,000 miles per hour as it approaches the edge of space, has flown five times at the 5,000-mile range during its flight program, now 16 months old.
