

Two Area Residents To Participate in Juvenile Session

Eugene—Two southern Oregon residents will participate in the third annual Juvenile Court Summer School at the University of Oregon campus here July 11 to 15, according to Roy Buehler, director.

Participating are Kay Crowell, director, Jackson County Circuit Court Juvenile department, Medford; and Fred Trost, professor, Southern Oregon college, Ashland.

At the school, speakers will also include Starke Hathaway, executive director of the psychiatry department of the University of Minnesota Medical school; James Gossett, noted Idaho juvenile judge; Garrett Heyns, head of corrections, State of Washington; and George Saleebey, chief of delinquency prevention services, California Youth authority.

Sponsors Noted
Sponsored jointly by the Oregon Juvenile Court Judges association and the university, the program is attended by juvenile judges, juvenile court directors, probation officers, law enforcement personnel and students from Oregon and adjacent states.

A public meeting on "The Community's Responsibility for the Delinquent Child" will be held July 12. It will feature a panel discussion between Judge Gossett and Dr. William Pew, with Judge Joseph Felton, president of the Oregon Juvenile Judges association, as moderator.

Workshop sessions during the week will foster "grass roots discussion" of the Oregon juvenile code in practice; major trends in correctional theory; interdisciplinary approaches to delinquency, and delinquency prevention in action.
