We Know Origin, But Not Importance of Sea Shells

It seems that the common sea shell is a deep, dark mystery to many people. Many think they are pieces of rock broken off by storms and washed and weathered until they attain the shapes and colors in which we find them.

Most folks seldom question their origin, but accept them as part of the beaches.

Each shell is actually made by the little animal who lives inside it. It is almost unbelievable that each empty shell that lies on the beach was the work of a small builder who built about himself a limestone house which was later cast upon the beach where the builder died, leaving his empty home on the sands.

No Answer

Just why there should be such a wide diversity of sea shells is a question no one has been able to answer. Neither can anyone say just what they are good for. Science has

Japanese Leftists In Demonstration Tokyo -UPI- Four thousand leftist students staged a noisy but non-violent demonstration in front of Tokyo's main police headquarters today to protest a tough new government security crackdown in advance of President Eisenhower's visit.

The new anti-government, anti-Eisenhower demonstration came as the giant federation of labor unions called a strike of its 5,800,000 claimed membership throughout Japan Wednesday in further protest of the visit.

The students - members of the fanatical Zenbakuken student organization which has vowed to "punish" Eisenhower and which was believed responsible for the mob attack on press secretary James C. Hagerty last Friday - snaked around the headquarters building.

Former Vicar Dies in Roseburg

The Rev. Albert E. Rander, first vicar of St. Martin's, Shady Cove, and Church of the Good Shepherd, Prospect, died Sunday, June 12, during ceremonies at St. George's Episcopal church, Roseburg. He was currently vicar of Sutherland and Drain Episcopal churches.

The Rev. Mr. Rander attended the dedication June 5 in Shady Cove of St. Martin's building. He was among the Episcopal ministers in Roseburg for the dedication of the new parish hall in connection with the church's 100th anniversary in Roseburg when he suffered the fatal heart attack.

Born in Manchester, England, the Rev. Mr. Rander was graduated from Emmanuel college, Saskatoon, Saskatchewan, Canada, and was assigned to the diocese of Saskatchewan and Montana before arriving in Prospect in 1953. He was the first resident vicar at Prospect and during his time there started the work at Shady Cove. He also assisted with services in St. Mark's Episcopal church, Medford.

He is survived by his wife, Mrs. Ina Rander, and two children, Twyla and Lauren, both at home.

Funeral services will be held Wednesday, June 15, at the Church of the Holy Spirit, Episcopal, Sutherland, at 11 a.m. The Right Rev. James W. F. Carman, bishop of Oregon, will officiate.

Building Own Small Industry Urged by Field Representative

Oregon communities should concentrate less on attracting large outside industries and more on building up their own small industries, according to Robert Drager, industrial field representative of the Oregon department of planning and development.

Drager told the Medford Chamber of Commerce roundtable luncheon at the Jackson hotel Monday that Oregon is sitting right on top of one of the largest and wealthiest markets in the country.

"There is a market here (California) that could flood (with business) every industry in the state of Oregon," he said, "if they only knew what is needed."

What is needed, he said, is for communities to be themselves aware of what is being made in their small local industries and then to get out and sell the products of these industries.

Drager was asked what the state will do to help these small industries.

He replied that the state can do some of the basic research, which it is now doing, but generally speaking, it is up to the particular area or community to support its own small industries.

He pointed out that the department of planning and development has recently undertaken a study to find out what products are made in Oregon and where they go, and what products are bought in Oregon and where they come from.

Another Step

Another step the department has taken is to request all cities to submit to it a complete industrial inventory which will list all the industries, large and small alike, located in a particular city or area.

He said that small industries, such as machine shops, finishing and metal fabrication plants, often make and sell only two or three products to much larger industries.

Does Not Have Time

The owner of such a business does not have the time nor the money to go in search of additional markets, even though the product may be a good one.

Although many of these small industries pay their owner a good wage, few will ever grow big without external encouragement, he contended.

One of the reasons that external encouragement is lacking, according to Drager, is that most communities do not have any knowledge of the particular products that these industries are making.

Drager said he has heard quite often from small businessmen that, "there is no use expanding—Oregon does not have any market—it's gone as far as it can go."

Next To Market

But this is not true, he said, because Oregon is right next to the California market.

However, to take advantage of this, Oregon industries will have to gear themselves to an out-of-state market, he pointed out.

Drager guesses that some 80 per cent of the products that pour into California each day come from points east of the Mississippi.

Yet, Oregon is more advantageously situated than these eastern manufacturers, he said, because where transportation costs them thousands of dollars, it costs Oregon producers only hundreds.

One of the things which is holding Oregon industry back, Drager noted, is a lack of knowledge of what is being purchased and what is wanted in out-of-state markets. Another factor which is a detriment to Oregon industry, Drager said, is that the salesmen in Oregon are "generally pessimistic and do a poor job of selling Oregon products."

What is needed, he said, is for communities to be themselves aware of what is being made in their small local industries and then to get out and sell the products of these industries.

Drager was asked what the state will do to help these small industries.

He replied that the state can do some of the basic research, which it is now doing, but generally speaking, it is up to the particular area or community to support its own small industries.

Drager guesses that some 80 per cent of the products that pour into California each day come from points east of the Mississippi.

Drager said one effort that communities might undertake to boost their local industries, is for them, through their chambers of commerce or similar groups, to encourage several small industries to band together and hire a man to investigate markets and forecast growth. But, above all, he said, such a man should be a good sales representative.

Drager had pointed out earlier that Oregon has not done a good job of advertising or selling itself, but said efforts are being taken to remedy this.

He further suggested that local banks and chambers of commerce assist small industries by advising them on how to go about plant and market expansion.

Because of this state's proximity to California markets, he concluded, "who has a better chance of developing their own industries than Oregon."
