Family Council

Gale S. - I can't stand his boss' flirting. Morton S. - She's a prude. Gale S. - How far is a wife supposed to go in helping her husband get ahead? My husband seems to think there are no limits. I've had the boss to dinner and entertained royally, but evidently that's not enough. The boss (who is past 50) took quite a shine to me. He and his wife invited us out to an evening on the town. He danced with me all evening - until I insisted I was too tired - flirted, squeezed my hand, played footsie under the table and carried on like a teen-ager. I was embarrassed to death, but my husband seems to think the whole thing is very funny and wants to set another date with him. Morton S. - Gale is, was and always will be, quite a prude. She has absolutely no sense of humor and becomes insulted at the slightest hint of flirtation or an even faint off-color joke. I saw everything the boss was doing and I think he didn't mean a thing by it. He's a fun-loving old geezer and likes to live things up. As a matter of fact I flirted with his wife (who is quite attractive for her age). Does that make me a lecher or something? I didn't mean anything by it. Sure, I want to get ahead, but I wouldn't use my wife to do it. I just want her to stop being so prissy and school-marmish. She should learn to relax and have a little harmless fun.

The Council: At the risk of being labeled schoolmarmish we wouldn't classify footsie-under-the-table as a harmless kind of game. We'll agree that tastes differ in the matter of fun, but we think Gale has every right to her taste too. She was the one who was being mauled and annoyed and she had a right to shout it. In some circles today the term prude has a far worse connotation than lecher. The lecher is looked on with good-natured amusement, but there is no salvation for the prude. We don't think Gale ought to be intimidated by such name-calling. She should not be forced to put up with flirtation and advances that are distasteful to her. It is more than likely that Morton is being dishonest with himself. Possibly he is amused that the boss, who is above him every day on the job, cannot get to first base with his young, attractive wife. If Gale responded favorably to the boss' advances, he would be far less amused. The wife is now played, it is a kind of sex tease, which enhances Morton's sense of ownership of his wife. We think Gale ought to take some positive steps to promote the kind of social relationship she and her husband can both enjoy. They can have fun and relaxation with other young couples who know how to enjoy life in an atmosphere of good taste. The "fun-loving old geezer" will probably not hold it against his employee if Morton turns in a good job but avoids close social contacts. The present setup could become dangerous career-wise. The boss's wife might very well get fed up with the situation and start exerting her influence - in the wrong direction. (Copyright 1960, General Features Corp.)

Teen-Age Problems

Many mothers write wondering what they can do about some of the problems that come up with their teenage children. Recently I read an article by H. H. Remmers and D. H. Radler in which they said that studies made of answers given by many teen-agers to questions, showed that their greatest concern is to be liked, and to feel that they "fit in." Poll after poll has shown that the youngsters are very sensitive to the opinions of others. Few teen-agers seem to admire the unusual schoolmate who has an excellent brain, with some originality and some ability to stand on his own feet, and to go his own way. Even in colleges the investigators found that most of the students look down on the type of young man who wants to go his own way and has the courage and the brains to do it. Three-fourths of our high school students seem to believe that the most important thing that they can learn is how to get along with people. Actually, they are very nearly right on this point. This is why I so distrust the modern practice of parents who do not believe in helping their children in their efforts to learn how to adjust to living in this world. Only 14 per cent of the high school students interviewed placed academic learning first in their list of requirements, and a similar trend was found in the views of college students. Some 60 per cent said they would rather be popular than brilliant, and 71 per cent felt that personality counts more than grades when it comes to getting a job. This may well be true. To me, one of the saddest findings brought out by the polls is that the youngsters are following many grown-ups in their worship of the supposed wisdom of "the group mind." Even in our universities the research worker and the man with a brilliant and original mind keeps running into opposition from men who keep saying to him, "Bow to the wisdom of the group." Which means, "Don't do anything new."

Is There An Operation For Constipation?

People ask me if there is any operation that will cure severe constipation, and my answer is that there is none that I would recommend. There is an operation on the rectum that is said to cure children with what is called megacolon, or Hirschsprung's disease - in which the large bowel becomes enormous, but I doubt if this would be worth trying by the adult with ordinary constipation. Some 40 years ago a number of surgeons tried to relieve constipation by cutting nerves to the lower end of the bowel, but I guess their results were poor, because the operations were soon given up. Some 50 years ago a few surgeons tried removing the large bowel, hoping thereby to cure insanity with so-called auto-intoxication or supposed poisoning derived from retained excrement, but some of the results were so bad and so disastrous that all surgeons stopped performing the operation. I rarely find anyone whose constipation is really a big problem; and practically always, then, I find a mildly psychotic person with some very queer relatives.
