

Boy Gets Wire Stuck in Throat

A 6-year-old boy got a piece of wire stuck in his throat while playing at the Jackson park swimming pool Thursday, and had to be taken to the Rogue Valley hospital by ambulance before it could be removed.

Doctors said Sammy Lee Herrington, Eagle Point, did not appear to be injured in any way, but they kept him in the hospital overnight for observation.

Sammy had reportedly put a piece of wire with a hook on the end of it in his mouth while playing in the dressing room at the pool. While he was scuffling with some other youths the wire got pushed and the hook lodged around his tonsil.

'Jacksonville Museum' Has Third Reprint

Ashland—A third reprint of "The Jacksonville Museum," a history prepared by Dr. Arthur S. Taylor, chairman, social science division, Southern Oregon college has recently been published by the Southern Oregon Historical society.

Altogether, 18,000 of the brochures, which were prepared on the occasion of the Oregon State Centennial, have been printed by Iverson's Printing company, Ashland.

Opening with a statement in praise of the museum as an outstanding tourist attraction in the state as well as a memorial to the gold rush days, Dr. Taylor's eight-page pamphlet contains pictures of the museum and its displays and also a map of the general area by Frank Ross.

In addition to giving the history of the museum, Dr. Taylor tells the valuable work that the Oregon Historical Society has done, and is doing for the upkeep of the memorial. They care for both the administration and maintenance duties of the building. The efforts of the staff in this respect are successful, for Dr. Taylor writes that 3,336 persons visit the exhibits each month on the average and 400,000 people have signed the guest book since the museum was formally dedicated Aug. 5, 1950.

Of special interest to many visitors are the rare documents in the files of the museum. This material, much of which has been microfilmed, has necessitated the purchase of a microfilm reader.

Dr. Taylor's work also serves as a souvenir of the minutes or hours spent browsing through the various exhibits by visitors to the museum.

Cattlemen's Group Agrees to Revised Proposal by Short

Salem — A committee of the Oregon Cattlemen's association, which had protested changes in the state department of agriculture's division of animal industry, Friday agreed to a modification proposed by J. F. Short, director of agriculture.

In a secondary move, Fred Pope, chief of the division of animal industry since Feb. 18, 1959, submitted his resignation with a request that it be read to the board.

Pope asked that the resignation become effective at the director's pleasure. He later said he would return for the time being to his ranch in Ft. Klamath but that he has several other things in mind.

Short's proposal to the cattlemen's committee, invited by Short to appear before the board, was made near the end of a day-long session of the state board of agriculture. It is subject to approval of the board and also will be taken to the membership of the cattlemen's association for ratification.

people will have the same feeling."

Earlier in the day, members of the cattlemen's committee defended what Short described as "the pattern of professional pressure groups" in an attempt to delay his removal of the state veterinarian and his services from under the chief of the division. Cattlemen said they were fearful for the livestock industry welfare and its relation to the consuming public if a layman were not over the state veterinary services.
