Invisible Comets
May Cause Many Meteor Showers

Washington, (Science Service)—Space in the region of the sun and its planets may be filled with a large number of very small, invisible comets, two Stanford University scientists reported here.

Drs. P. B. Gallagher and V. R. Eselman of Stanford's Radio-science Laboratory said their daily measurements of the trails left by meteors showed many more than could be accounted for from known meteors. Meteors are believed associated with past and present comets and are seen as "shooting stars" when they crash and burn in the earth's atmosphere.

At certain times of the year, the earth encounters meteor streams, the debris of comets, and then the display of "shooting stars" is often spectacular. The Stanford radar studies showed that the high rate of meteors could not be reconciled with the accepted theory of meteor streams.

Frequent Showers
Instead of a few meteor showers during the year plus a large background of independently traveling particles, the scientists suggest that meteor showers occur frequently but unpredictably, with occasional predictable showers of large particles (the known meteor streams).

The earth crosses the paths of millions of showers as it travels around the sun, they suggest in the current Journal of Geophysical Research (June), published by the American Geophysical Union here. The number of these is so great, and a given group is met so rarely that they believe it is impossible to predict the occurrence of particular showers. The particles producing the trails they studied by radar have a mass a ten-thousandth that producing the faintest visible trail.

Letters Received
23 Years Too Late

Boston—Hundreds of persons were surprised when they received letters that had been mailed to them back in 1937.

The missing missives were in a sack found wedged in a chute at Boston's main post office. The chute had not been used for several years and workmen were dismantling it when they made their discovery.

TASS RIPS PRESIDENT

Moscow—(UPI)—The official Soviet news agency Tass Wednesday accused President Eisenhower of sidestepping the "unpleasant subjects" concerning the summit collapse at his press conference. It also said he "preferred to sidestep" the recent cancellation of his Japanese visit and the evaluation of his place in history.

7,000,000 HOMELESS

Geneva—(UPI)—More than seven million persons were left homeless by the recent earth shiftings in Chile, the World Council of Churches reported Wednesday. A report submitted to the WCC estimated the damage to buildings in the 10 southern Chilean provinces affected at $400 million.
