Routine Mouth X-Rays Said To Call for Change in Dentists

Washington, (Science Service) "Change dentists, if the one you have exposes you or your children to full mouth X-rays semi-annually or even annually, as a matter of routine," Dr. Linus C. Pauling, the Nobel Prize winner and chemistry professor at the California Institute of Technology, has advised in an interview.

Dr. Pauling was recently in the news for his opposition to nuclear testing as a hazard to world peace and health.

According to the Nobel scientist, indiscriminate use of X-rays may be a greater health hazard than current exposure to radiation fallout from nuclear weapon tests. The danger from the X-rays is greater for children and embryonic infants known to be more susceptible to radiation damage than other age groups. This is true for all radiation.

Oral X-Rays Warranted

Dr. Pauling told Science Service that an important difference is that X-rays, used judiciously, are beneficial while fallout radiation is not. He believes that complete oral X-rays are warranted only where such diagnosis aid is essential in determining proper treatment.

Leading professional dental and radiological groups, as well as authorities in the U.S. Public Health Service (PHS) agree with this. However, dentists and radiologists caution against the other extreme tendency of avoiding X-rays when they are essential.

"As much damage can be done to one's health by completely rejecting the use of dental and medical X-rays as by their injudicious use," a radiologist from PHS warned. But he agreed that the advice offered by the Nobelist was essentially sound.

Disclosure Urged

Dental authorities urge "full disclosure" when a dentist recommends the use of X-rays in any particular instance. "The patient should feel free to ask and the dentist should be willing to explain why X-rays are recommended."

As a matter of fact, studies show that dentists have been ahead of other medical groups in demanding and securing the most modern and efficient X-ray machines and equipment designed to cut down radiation exposure.

In many offices and clinics, leaded aprons are worn during X-ray by the patient as well as the dentist or technician in order to further cut down exposure. Monitoring badges are commonly worn to measure levels of exposure to office personnel.

According to the U.S. PHS Division of Radiological Health, the 88,000 practicing dentists in the United States are their own radiologists and thus are exposed to far more radiation than any individual patient.

"Enlightened self-interest," therefore, as well as a desire to provide the best in dental care underlies the demand of the dental profession for the best and safest X-ray equipment.

Inspections in Demand

PHS inspections of dental X-ray equipment throughout the United States by its field workers are so much in demand that the division of radiological health has devised a "do-it-yourself" testing kit.

The kit contains film that is exposed to the machine tested and then mailed back to PHS for analysis.

Following analysis, recommendations are forwarded for correction or improvement of equipment if indicated.

Dr. George Crocker, in charge of the PHS program, used the kits successfully first in Prince Georges County, Md., near here. The technique is well on its way toward nation-wide acceptance, according to Dr. Crocker, and will cut down radiation exposure from dental X-rays to a great extent.

New and better machines and fast film have, in the past decade, cut down radiation exposure from dental X-rays by as much as a thousand per cent. "We take the position in dentistry and medicine," said one PHS authority, "that no radiation is best and we intend to keep what we must use at a minimum."

Thawed Food May Be Refrozen

Frozen foods which have been allowed to thaw should not be refrozen without first being cooked.

When thawing foods for a meal, try to thaw only as much food as you will use. Thawed foods which have been refrozen are not always unsafe, but they will always lose flavor and quality. In many cases they will spoil quickly.

In case the freezer operation is stopped, keep the door closed. If the freezer is well-filled and the foods are packaged properly, they will usually stay frozen for at least two days.

If freezer operation is to be stopped for a lengthy period of time, dry ice, arranged to cover all the packages, will preserve the foods. Dry ice can often be obtained from a grocery or ice cream store. If none is available, the food packages may, of course, be stored in a commercial food locker.

Should the frozen food packages begin to thaw before freezer operation can be resumed, check each package carefully. You can refreeze any package in which some ice still remains. These foods should be marked and used as soon as practicable.

Any foods which have thawed completely should be cooked before freezing again. Fruits may be baked into pies, canned, or made into preserves. Vegetables may be canned. Meats, fish, and poultry may be cooked and refrozen, but should not be stored in the freezer for any long period of time.
