Moslem Missionaries Wooing Africans From 'White Man's Religion'

By LOUIS CASSELS
United Press International

For more than 100 years, ever since Dr. Livingstone blazed a missionary trail into the jungle, it has been confidently assumed in the west that Africa would some day become a Christian continent.

That assumption is now being rudely shaken. Another major religion is making an all-out bid for the allegiance of the teeming millions who are emerging from primitivism in Africa. And it appears at present to hold a decided lead over Christianity.

The rival faith is Islam. Founded by the prophet Mohammed in the 7th Century A. D., Islam has always been, like Christianity, an intensely evangelical religion. But until a few years ago, its penetration of Africa was largely confined to the Arab countries fringing the Mediterranean.

Today Moslem missionaries are moving energetically into the vast "black belt" of tropical Africa south of the Sahara desert.

Comes Home Concerned

Evangelist Billy Graham, who conducted an eight week crusade in Africa earlier this year, came home deeply concerned about the vigorous Moslem challenge to Christianity.

He says Islam is winning seven converts for every three won by Christianity.

Several factors have combined to give Islam a big advantage over Christianity in wooing Africans away from the bush gods of tribal religions.

Christianity is seriously handicapped because many fiercely nationalistic and race-conscious Africans look upon it as a "white man's religion" that was brought into Africa by colonial powers of Europe.

Islam, on the other hand, is being presented as "an African religion" which has never had a color line.

Islam makes far easier demands on its African converts than does Christianity. For example, an African who becomes a Moslem, he can continue to have several wives. This is no small consideration in overwhelmingly polygamous tropical Africa.

Islam has also been willing to let its new converts continue to practice many of the rituals of their old tribal religions, including black magic, which Christian missionaries cannot condone.

What Can Be Done

What can Christianity do to cope with the Moslem challenge? Protestant and Catholic church leaders are earnestly seeking answers. They reject any notion of watering down the Christian gospel and moral code to compete with the simple and convenient religion which Islam is offering to African converts.

They believe that dramatic steps must be taken to show Africans that Christianity is not a "European export" nor a "white man's religion," but a universal faith.

Pope John XXIII took one such step recently when he named an African Negro to the College of Cardinals for the first time in history.

Protestants are also increasingly conscious of the need to surrender leadership of African churches to native clergymen.

Because there is a great shortage of trained African clergymen, foreign missionaries will continue to be needed in great numbers for a long time to come. But the far-sighted ones are already moving quietly into the background, into service and advisory posts, while Africans take over the bishoprics and superintendencies.

Some 135 Jehovah's Witnesses from the Medford congregation will leave Wednesday for Portland, where they will attend the four-day district assembly at Multnomah stadium. Highlight of the convention will be Sunday, July 31, at 3 p.m., with the public address "Security During War of the Great Day of God the Almighty" by J. O. Groh, minister of Jehovah's Witnesses from the Watchtower Bible and Tract Society world headquarters in Brooklyn, N.Y.

All regularly scheduled meetings at the local Kingdom Hall will be canceled during the week, Nixon said.

The purpose of the convention, according to the spokesman, is to ensure that all in attendance may be armed with knowledge, faith and ministerial zeal, so that they may be equipped to withstand modern-day pressures of materialism, communism, racial strife and threat of disillusionment in these non-peaceful times.

There is only one way that one can know that he has been truly converted and is right with God. That is by having the assurance of God's word. John wrote, "And hereby we do know that we know him, if we keep His commandments." (Jno. 2:3)
Obey the divine commands concerning conversion that are laid down in God's word, and you can be sure that your sins have been washed away in the blood of the Lamb.
