

Family Council

Editors Note: The Family Council consists of three citizens, a newspaper, a woman's club and two writers. Each article has a title, an actual case history. The Council reports on problems and has been dealt with by responsible agencies and counselors.

Jill B. - Ann complains too. Ann R. - She's too complacent. Jill B. - My friend Ann and I are both single girls in our mid-20s. We get along very well and have enjoyed double dating and going on short vacations together.

Ann R. - Jill takes it very seriously when I complain to her. I've tried to explain that it's not so important as all that. I find that at times I have to let off a little steam.

I do feel Jill and I aren't doing very well socially. We don't seem to be attracting the better type men and all too often get involved with jerks and wolvers. Jill just shrugs her shoulders and says "better luck next time," but I can't be like that. It makes me sore to see these attractive girls walk off with all the best guys.

The Council: We'll agree that it is better for a discontented person to let off steam in complaints than bottle his miseries. But this behavior isn't fair to others and it accomplishes little.

The chronic complainer has found that he can make himself feel a little better by letting off steam. Then he settles down in satisfaction for a while - until his discontent begins seething within him again. He would do far better to save his steam to change things.

Ann, for example, could use her energy to far better advantage by studying her problem and doing something to solve her lot. Instead of envying the girls who "walk off with the best guys," she might try to find out where and how they met and what assets the other girls had, aside from appearance, that might have attracted the better men.
