

Adieu, Bossy; West Leaves Stockyards For the Last Time

By DICK WEST
Chicago (UPI) — The time has come to take the bunting off the sheep dips and give the stockyards back to the cows.

But save your Rockefeller buttons, boys; New York may rise again.

I don't believe I will be revealing any secrets of value to the Russians if I now disclose the 1960 Republican National convention ended Thursday night. And with it ended an era.

The closing gavel rap also sounded a death knell over the traditional coalition between politics and livestock. Neither will ever be the same.

The breach became apparent when Richard M. Nixon picked Henry Cabot Lodge, instead of a white-faced Hereford, to be his running mate. But this was only a side effect.

Build New Auditorium

The basic cause of the separation is the almost completed new auditorium on the Chicago lake front. Indications are that it will be the site of any GOP or Democratic conventions held here in the future.

It seems unlikely that either party will return to the old stockyard Exposition Hall, hard by the salt licks, where for so many times political hogwash has been blended with the real thing.

Therefore, as I leave the hall and the nearby cattle pens for the last time, I am overwhelmed with nostalgia.

When I resume my career as a candidate-watcher, I will be back in Washington and I imagine it will seem a bit strange to see politicians in their natural habitat again. Strange, but restful.

These quadrennial road shows may be stimulating but they also are tiring. For one thing, convention news conferences always become mob scenes, where every clique has its claque.

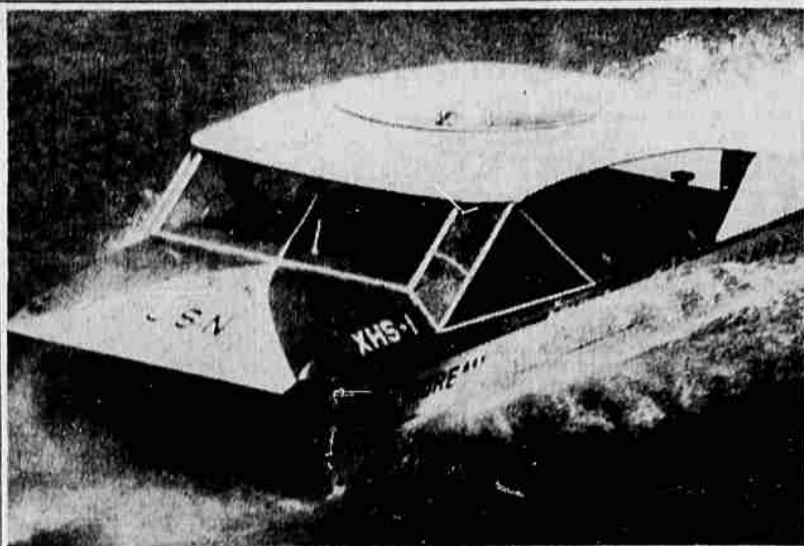

Some of the politicians who have been basking in the convention spotlight will be lucky to attract the correspondent of their home town newspaper when they return to the capital two weeks hence.

It also will be nice to travel in normal traffic jams once more. Motoring in a convention city bears a strong resemblance to the chariot race in Ben Hur.

There are, however, some things about conventions that I shall miss. I shall miss the Pepsi Cola girls and the Cola-Cola girls, not to mention the Kennedy, Johnson, Symington, Stevenson, Nixon, Rockefeller and Goldwater girls. They gave me a new appreciation of soft drinks and campaign buttons.

Farewell, my loves, until 1964. And thanks old Bossy, for the use of the hall.

NIXON AS LEADER

Having succeeded in appeasing Governor Rockefeller, the Vice President has had then to deal with his most difficult problem, which is how to get a platform and to persuade the party to take a stand which will give him a chance to win the election. For the Rockefeller platform and the Rockefeller stand were indubitably the best bet if any Republican can win the Presidency this year.

All the polls show that the Republicans are a much smaller party than the Democrats, something like 40 to 60. To be elected, Nixon has to be much stronger than his party — if the Gallup poll is right, if he has to be even stronger than Eisenhower was in 1956. To come near this he has to be very strong in the big industrial and urbanized states. He needs a platform which in its pledges to deal with public needs is substantially the same as the Democratic platform and Governor Rockefeller's personal platform.

That this is what he would like to do is shown by a speech he made at St. Louis last month. After scoffing at Rockefeller's "growthmanship," he turned around and espoused the Rockefeller-Democratic position on public needs. He called for public spending, which he called "investment" in "our public education establishments, in our national transportation system, in the renewal of our urban areas, in the development of our natural and human resources, in providing imaginative new leadership for the exciting scientific and technological revolution which will dramatically change the whole character of life in America and the world in our time."

THIS BEING what Nixon would like to stand for, he has to reckon with the President and his close advisors, on the one hand and with the Congressional Republicans from the old Republican strongholds on the other. We have seen, as I pointed out yesterday, that in his agreement with Rockefeller on defense and public needs, he was very careful indeed to avoid any departure from the main lines of the Eisenhower economic and fiscal policy. This does not mean that as President he would not depart from them. As a matter of fact he would be almost bound to depart from them. But it does mean that in the campaign he must be careful not to say that he has departed from them. This is a serious handicap. For the things that he and Rockefeller would like to do can not be done without a substantial change in the Eisenhower policy.

In the writing of the platform the dominant voices appear to be not so much Eisenhower and his immediate advisors, but the Republican Old Guard in Congress fortified by an eccentric fringe of reactionaries who dream of a golden past that never existed and pretend that they are conservatives. The main preoccupation of the Old Guard Republicans is not to elect Nixon. It is not even to carry Congress, which they know is impossible. Their main preoccupation is to preserve their power in Congress which rests on a coalition with many of the older Southern Democrats. The bond of their coalition is that the Northern Republicans will help to stall off civil rights measures and that with the Southerners they will both stall off the welfare measures.

This is the reason, which is otherwise politically inexplicable, why Nixon is having such a hard time to get a civil rights plank on which he can stand in the big Northern states.

IF, IN SPITE of his handicaps, Nixon manages to be elected, he will face the problem of how to govern with a Democratic Congress. Eisenhower has had to do this, and no doubt, the world would not come to an end if Nixon had to do it. But almost certainly it is true that the country would be in for a troubled time.

As President in dealing with a Democratic Congress, Nixon would differ from Eisenhower in two main respects. The first, which is obvious, is that he is not Eisenhower, that he is not above the party battle, and that he does not inspire instinctive popular affection.

The second, which is somewhat less obvious, is that in the 'fifties the country was weary of the effort and exertions of the New Deal and of the two wars. It was not too difficult to be the national leader on a policy of doing as little as possible in a time when nobody wanted to do very much. But we are now in the 'sixties, and as Nixon and Rockefeller both know, there are a great many things which will have to be done. It would be much harder for Nixon to lead a Democratic Congress affirmatively than it has been for Eisenhower to hold it down negatively.

In this question of Nixon's prospect as an effective national leader in a divided government we shall see, I think, one of the main issues of the coming campaign.

ROCKEFELLER'S SERVICE

Chicago—The drama of the platform, which provided the Republican convention's only real drama, is now over.

There is evidence that the act was pretty stirring, too, at any rate behind the scenes. Contrary to common report, A. Rockefeller Monday night firmly refused to accept the meaningless national defense plank prepared by the platform committee. Vice President Richard M. Nixon was also boldly faithful to the language and ideas of his New York compact with Rockefeller.

Meanwhile, however, all sorts of rumblings had begun to be heard from Newport. President Eisenhower might well have been content to ignore the language of the platform, as he effectively ignored the Nixon-Rockefeller compact, if he had only been left to himself. But he was not left to himself.

The Eisenhower staff, preoccupied as always with what is called the Eisenhower image, got into the act with both feet. The White House liaison man in Chicago, Robert Merriam, became active here. The Newport contingent became active there. Great efforts had to be made, before the Vice President and the New York governor found language which said what they wished to say—that the national defense effort must be intensified and accelerated—without seeming too critical of the Eisenhower defense record.

The simple statement that the defense effort must be both intensified and accelerated is, of course, an implied repudiation of the President's repeated, often angry assertions that nothing of this sort is at all necessary. Eisenhower was not pleased, according to reports.

The Platform Committee was not pleased either. It had to be rather brutally bludgeoned into compliance with the Vice President's will concerning the defense plank.

The time has come, therefore, to point the drama's moral. The moral concerns the importance of a breed of politician that is too rare in America—that may be called the issues-and-ideas politician.

There are two pre-eminent issues-and-ideas politicians at this convention. One is Senator Goldwater, the hero of the extreme right. The other is Governor Rockefeller. The difference between them is simple. Senator Goldwater's issues and ideas belong to a world that never was, or at least a world that died at the end of the 19th century. But Governor Rockefeller's issues and ideas are directly developed from the realistic, current national situation.

When Governor Rockefeller began to stake out his issues and to insist upon his ideas, the Republican majority was both bewildered and outraged. Unfortunately for the party, the Republican majority really does not understand this kind of behavior, except from members of its own right wing.

Right wingers, like Senator Goldwater, are permitted and expected to talk about their "principles." Everyone else is expected to talk the language of expediency. It was highly inexpedient, not to say tactless, of Governor Rockefeller to challenge the President on defense and many other issues, and to ask where the Vice President stood on these issues.

Indignation was therefore widespread. Almost no one but the man who was thought to be most adversely affected, Vice President Nixon, had the solid good sense to say what ought to have been obvious. Nixon quietly commented that the New York Governor had a perfect right to demand ventilation of national issues of the highest import.

Even so, Governor Rockefeller might easily have been rewarded with the kind of grandiose public humiliation that most of the delegates here would love to inflict upon him. The issues-and-ideas politician always risks more than the political tactician. In the short run, he causes bad feeling in his party. In the long run, he can only win if he has got his facts precisely right, and has also judged the meaning of those facts with extreme precision.

That, really, was how Governor Rockefeller won. If the issues he made had not been greatly inflamed by recent events—if the Rockefeller arguments had not been three-quarters proven, in fact—Rockefeller would have been duly humiliated at this rally in Chicago. Vice President Nixon did not make his famous compact with Governor Rockefeller because of his tender regard for Rockefeller's feelings. He made his compact because it was the necessary, sensible thing to do.

That, really, was how Governor Rockefeller won. If the

The result is a great service to the Republican party, and to the country, jointly performed by Nixon and Rockefeller. But it must be added that the Vice President, because of his special and far from easy personal situation, could hardly have joined in performing this great service if the New York governor had not taken the initial risk (c) 1960 New York Herald Tribune Inc.
