Sheriff's deputies Monday were investigating the burglary of Ben's O.K. Second time Sunday night.

Only a gun-cleaning kit was taken. A gun rack had been broken into and two rifles removed, but these were found near the door, deputies said. Entry was gained through a window.

Thieves also entered the Walter B. Richardson residence on Tolman Creek rd. in the Ashland area over the week end. No thefts were reported, but guns were broken up.

Navy Diving School Trains Men in Saving Lives, Ships

Washington—UPI—The Navy deep sea diving school is a capable outfit, its graduates salvage ships, also save lives.

For the human example, take the case of Floyd E. Goines, a Muskogee, Okla., policeman. He escaped a watery grave in a lake near his home by spurling 80 feet to the surface. Stricken with the bends, he was flown to the Diving school here and sealed into a recompression tank. Goines recovered.

Consider the ship salvaging business conducted by the diving school. At Pearl Harbor, divers salvaged 15 ships after the infamous attack by Japanese planes on Dec. 7, 1941. One of the three vessels still unraised is the USS Arizona, the fleet flagship. The Arizona blew apart and sank in 30 feet of water. An estimated 1,000 bodies still are sealed in the wreckage. The extent of the damage the ship was nearly demolished—makes salvage operations impractical.

The men who dive are trained at the diving school. Here they spend much of their time out of the water but under pressures exerted at various depths by use of air recompression chambers.

The nearest they come to water is a 15-foot deep pool in the school and the Potomac river.

Lt. Cmdr. Emmett W. Carpenter, assistant officer in charge of the school, says practice dives in 20 feet of Potomac water are "like being blindfolded, it's that dirty. And on the bottom you can sink up to your shoulders in mud."

Then there is the ship with its ups and downs. Several times during the life of a diving class, a group—usually around 85—raises and sinks an old 105-foot Navy hulk in about 20 feet of Potomac water.

Under-water cutting and welding classes get a chance to cut up and patch another hulk nearby.

When France's giant passenger liner Normandie rolled over and sank in New York Harbor early in 1942, the diving school idea was born. The Normandie sank after water from fire hoses became trapped in the upper decks during a blaze. The Navy had only a few trained divers then, and it took them several years to raise the big ship.

Divers know how to handle three types of dives when the school gives them a diploma: Deep dives in "hard-hat" suits, "Seuba" dives up to 130 feet, and shallow water dives.

The deepest "working" dive for salvaging purposes is 442 feet, according to Carpenter. This occurred when a Diver Robert Metzger went to the bottom of the sea 15 miles off the New England coast to the USS O-9, a World War I submarine which failed to come up after a routine practice dive. The O-9 was never salvaged. The Navy never determined why it sank.

Navy divers generally salvage parts of ships rather than the whole hulks. Many times they go after airplanes down at sea, bringing up important instruments. During World War II divers were credited with salvaging some $2 billion worth of ships and equipment.

Salem—UPI—Loy S. Clark, Beaverton, has been fined $200 by Public Utility Commissioner J. C. Hill for moving pipe from Clackamas to Albany without proper authority.
