Small Worlds Around Us

Little Dog Busily Buried Bones, and Then One Day . . .

"It's sure funny. I distinctly remember burying it at that exact spot, now it's gone." This must have been what went through the little dog's mind as she scratched the dirt away and sniffed at the empty hole, hunting for something that just was not there.

Like her primitive ancestors eons ago, the little dog was accustomed to burying bones or any other object she didn't want to eat or play with at the time. Strangely enough, she remembered where she buried her treasures, for she was repeatedly observed digging them out later.

The dog's owners, curious as to whether or not she remembered where she buried what she didn't immediately want, carefully marked each location with a plant-marker; observing how much time elapsed between the actual burial and the later recovery. The dog wasn't consistent in this. Sometimes a bone was dug up within an hour after being buried. At other times it might be several days. Some marked locations had not been revisited by the dog for several weeks. These, the owners thought, had been completely forgotten.

No Way of Knowing

Yet there were times when confusion took over completely in the owners' minds, for the dog would go to a place and dig to recover a bone or a plaything that had been buried weeks before.

There was a bird-feeder in the fenced-in back yard, on which bread was occasionally placed. If a crust fell to the ground the dog grabbed it, hunted up a soft spot in a flower bed and there she buried the bread. At times some of these pieces were dug up and moved to other locations for no understandable reason.

The actual burying was quite a process. The dirt would fly behind as the little dog dug with both front feet. Once the hole was of sufficient depth, the bone was placed carefully in the bottom; frequently pushed down firmly into the earth. Then, with her nose the dog pushed the dirt back until the hole was filled.

At Least One Hundred

The owners estimated there were at least a hundred caches of buried treasure in the yard. If the dog actually did know where each treasure was buried, her mind would be badly cluttered with geographically locations. The owners gave the little dog a great deal of credit, and told their friends of her intelligence.

Then one day something happened that discredited the dog's intelligence a little in the owner's minds. It also probably frustrated the dog no end when she went to retrieve one of her treasures. This prized possession she had so carefully buried was an icecube.
