'Inner City' Named Protestant Target; Need New Approach

By LOUIS CASSELS United Press International Protestant churches are beginning to face up to a challenge from which they long have fled. It is the challenge of the "inner city."

Inner city is a term the social scientists thought up to describe the densely-populated residential areas which lie in and around the heart of a great metropolis.

The inner city contains a few oases of luxury hotels and apartments. But it is mainly composed of slums, near-slums, and "changing neighborhoods."

It is a place where poverty, crime, alcoholism, overcrowding, broken homes, juvenile delinquency and human desperation abound.

The Catholic church followed her immigrant children into the urban jungles in the 19th century. But America's major Protestant bodies have never felt at home amid the squalid surroundings and explosive racial tensions of the inner city.

Oriented by history toward small town and rural ways, they have concentrated building new churches in the lushly-growing middle class suburbs, and have let the inner city go by default.

Admit Previous Shortcomings This is not an outsider's harsh judgment of the Protestant record. It is a rather mild version of what Protestants have been saying about themselves in their church publications and at their conferences and conventions.

Now Protestants are trying to make amends for their neglect of a vast mission field in their midst.

Nearly all of the big denominations have set up special departments or agencies to tackle the enormous problems involved in providing an effective ministry to the inner city.

There are problems of money, manpower and method. The wealthy congregations of suburbia must be persuaded to contribute through denominational channels the funds necessary to operate inner city missions which will not soon, if ever, be self-supporting.

Young clergymen must be found who are willing to move their families into the slums, and share the lives of their people. And these urban missionaries must be given special training to minister to a wide range of human needs.

Finally, there must be a fresh approach. Ground down by a hostile environment suspicious of all "respectable" institutions, the poverty-haunted people of the inner city simply will not respond to a transplanted version of the neat little Protestant churches which do so well in the suburbs. If the church hopes to make a place for itself in the inner city, it must serve before it preaches; and it must be prepared to get its hands dirty.

These facts have been demonstrated in the East Harlem Protestant parish in New York, the great pioneering experiment which proved that Protestantism can reach the inner city if it tries hard enough.

The East Harlem parish, now in its tenth year, is jointly supported by seven major denominations. It has a full-time staff of nine specially-trained clergymen who live with their families in the teeming slum which they serve. It conducts services in rented store fronts instead of erecting costly church buildings.

YOUTH ATTEND CAMP Applegate Valley - Thirty young people from Ruch Community church have been attending Bible camp at Lake of the Woods Boy Scout camp during the last three weeks of August. Teenagers are attending this week, and junior boys are enrolled for the final week. Those from the local church serving as counselors are Joyce and Joan Hawkins, Mary Beth Ramsey, and Fred DeVoss.

The Family Council

Editor's Note: The Family Council consists of a judge, a psychiatrist, three clergymen, three editors and a women's editor. Each article is a summary of an actual case history. The Council reports on problems that have been dealt with by responsible agencies, and counselors.

Margaret S. - Jeff should control his temper. Jeffrey S. - The children must be disciplined.

Margaret S. - My husband and I have been married more than ten years and have four fine children. My problem is one that has bothered me ever since the early days of our marriage. It is my husband's terrible temper. Perhaps I shouldn't call it terrible because he has never done anything more violent than swear, bang a door or slap a child, but there is usually great ferocity behind these gestures. He often flares up at silly things and his facial expressions at these times are sometimes frightening.

I feel he simply must discipline himself so it won't happen in front of the children. They are really afraid of him at times.

Jeffrey S. - Marge knows very well that I have the children's interest at heart just as much as she does, but there are times when you have to let a child know what's what and if you're afraid to frighten him or leave a bad impression on him you get absolutely no place.

I feel that our kids are pretty loosely disciplined. Marge is an exceptionally patient mother and never even yells at them. Someone in the family must take a strong hand.

According to Marge, you should never be anything but sweetness and smiles with kids, but how many people can be like her? I don't think it does the kids a bit of harm to be afraid of me-when they do wrong.

The Council: It is interesting that Margaret and Jeffrey state their cases in completely different ways.

Margaret is concerned about Jeff's temper, but he speaks entirely about disciplining the children. Apparently he refuses to let Margaret's accusation even generate his consciousness. Like the alcoholic, who is convinced his drinking is entirely under control, Jeff refuses to entertain the idea that there is something amiss in his conduct.

We agree that it does children no harm to see a bit of well-timed, righteous wrath on the part of a parent, but it does them no good to see frequent, irrational flare-ups. The violence behind the flare-ups may be controlled, but the signs Margaret notes are also seen by the children. Eventually, we think they will become unafraid of these flare-ups. They will come to realize that their father can't control them and that they represent weakness rather than strength on his part.

Jeff should try to look at his behavior more honestly. Possibly he is right when he says he merely wants to discipline the children, but we think it more likely he is simply giving vent to his own fury or irritation, which may arise from causes having nothing to do with the children.

Temper of this sort can't be controlled any better than Jeff is already controlling it. Probably he would like to indulge in even greater violence. The only way to bring about a change is through a different outlook on life and an effort to set new emotional patterns. This may call for the help of a psychiatrist.

Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins

The Toad is a Creature of Mystery A story that has gotten good mileage is the one about the toad being found alive in the cornerstone of a razed building. The toad supposedly had been buried alive for many years - many years without water, food or air.

The toad always has been a creature of mystery. Even today, "toadskins" are used in Oriental countries for supposed healing properties; witches and sorcerers have used parts of this harmless creature's body for mystic incantations and mysterious brews.

Shakespeare, Too William Shakespeare attributed the toad with strange powers when he wrote "which like the toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in its head." The eye of the toad is very beautiful; it is supposed to reflect some of the beauty of a jewel. "Wearing the toadstone" was supposed to be insurance against venomous serpents or other poisons. This "toadstone fable" is still persistent. Perhaps because animals we do not see frequently we never completely understand.

Toads are really nice people. For consistent, solemn dignity they have few equals. Two or more of these creatures sitting solemnly under will become unafraid of these flare-ups. They will come to realize that their father can't control them and that they represent weakness rather than strength on his part.

Jeff should try to look at his behavior more honestly. Possibly he is right when he says he merely wants to discipline the children, but we think it more likely he is simply giving vent to his own fury or irritation, which may arise from causes having nothing to do with the children.

Ordinarily, the toad prefers a damp, cool environment, seldom spending much time in water, seeming to have had enough of an aquatic existence while in the tadpole stage. The toad is different in many ways but certainly is not sinister, mysterious or venomous. But one thing is certain, neither he nor any other living creature could live for years in the cornerstone of a building.

Barbara Powers Gets Hollywood Offers Moscow-UPI-Mrs. Barbara Powers has received several offers of a motion picture contract since her husband's U2 flight plunged them into fame, her attorney said today.

Frank Rogers, who accompanied her to Moscow to watch the trial of her husband, Francis Gary Powers, said "none of the offers have been taken seriously, however."

Beneficial Toads are beneficial to the garden; they have to fill their stomachs four or five times a day and the filling is entirely bugs. One of the most humorous of spectacles is to watch a fat toad use its short

Army Unveils Big Proving Ground

Dugway Proving Ground, Utah-UPI-The Army took some of the wraps off its vast Dugway Proving Ground Thursday to give newsmen their first peek at some current chemical, bacteriological and radiological warfare tools.

The proving ground, covering an area the size of Rhode Island, has been one of the most closely guarded military installations in the nation for years.

However, the Army's Chemical Warfare Service permitted a group of about 40 correspondents to visit the installation today for a briefing on the latest developments on these obscure methods of warfare.
