

Softwood Species Form Economy for 500 Communities

Know a ponderosa pine when you see it? Or a Douglas fir or an incense cedar? Readers of the Mail Tribune will have a chance to sharpen up on tree identification and bone up on forest facts with a new illustrated series beginning tomorrow.

Called "Timberland Trees," the feature will picture each of 11 commercially important softwood tree species which grow in the 12-state Western Pine region.

The featured trees will be ponderosa pine, Douglas fir, white fir, lodgepole pine, larch, sugar pine, Idaho white pine, incense cedar, red cedar, Engelmann spruce and western hemlock.

The growth range of each tree type is indicated on the map. Symbols enclosed in circles represent species of primary importance within the dotted area, while other tree types of varying importance are noted by initials only.

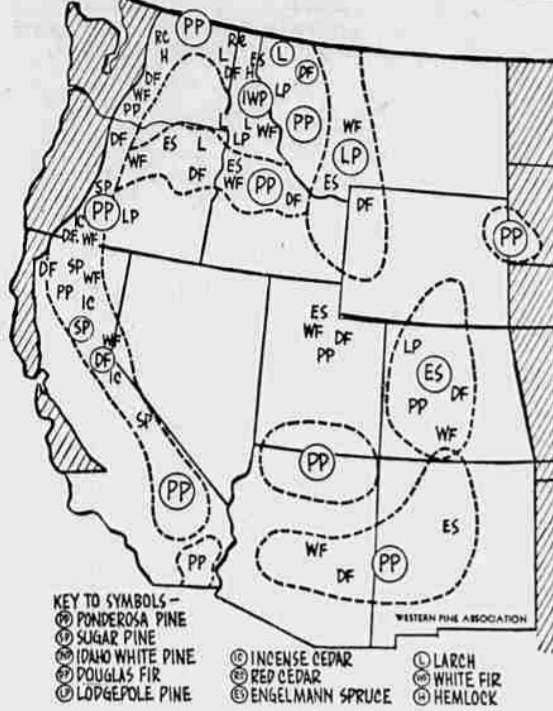

These trees, grown and harvested and re-grown on a sustained yield plan, form the basis for a productive forest economy directly affecting more than 500 communities in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Nevada, New Mexico, Montana, Oregon, South Dakota, Utah, Washington and Wyoming.

It sustains industries which provided direct payrolls to 70,000 people, and supports hundreds of thousands more.

It contains 820 billion board feet of standing sawtimber (trees 11 inches or larger in diameter at breast height).

It contains 87 million acres of commercial forest land.

It furnishes the nation's economy with about 9 billion board feet, or 300,000 carloads, of lumber each year.

WHERE THE WEST'S TREES GROW—Western United States has commercial forests totaling 117,000,000 acres containing 1 1/3 trillion board feet of sawtimber. The western pine region covers 87,300,000 of these acres and contains 620 billion board feet of sawtimber. Map above shows where major species of region grow. Large circles symbolize predominant tree species within surrounding dotted area. Other trees are indicated where they grow in important volume.
