The Private World of ART CARNEY

Behind this brilliant comedian, who is also one of the most talented, versatile actors of our day, lies a quiet man determined not to share his "other" life

By GEORGE O'NEAL

Art Carney's favorite role is that

Proud father Carney (far left) holds son, Paul, then one year old. Art met wife Jean (left) in high school when he helped her campaign for class vice-presidency. "She made real good fried-egg sandwiches," he recalls. On Aug. 15, the Carneys celebrated their 20th wedding anniversary.

Not too long ago, Art Carney told me a significant story. It had to do with an interview that his daughter Eileen participated in at Endicott Junior College, in Massachusetts, which she is entering this fall.

"When Eileen went up there," Art related, "did I get a comedown! After writing my name down on the record sheet, the admissions officer said to her: 'And what does your father do?'"

Art twisted his expressive face toward me in a comic grimace as he commented: "So what? You can't expect everybody to look at everything on TV."

No story could better illustrate the easygoing, unpretentious nature of this gifted actor and comedian. His career continues to grow in stature. Millions of people have become forcefully aware of his immense acting range, yet he remains in his private life the quiet family man. The kind of guy who recently found himself buying a house without meaning to. (He was outvoted by his charming wife Jean, their three children, their cat Butterball, her three new kittens, and a grand piano.)

It is incredible that the man who has played so many diversified roles remains mild-mannered, almost introverted. He won plaudits for his portrayal of a toy-factory worker in "The Incredible World of Horace Ford," who became so obsessed with childhood memories that he began to act like a child and went to pieces; the delightful Elmer Dowd in "Harvey" whose imaginary rabbit became real even to the skeptics; and the alcoholic in "Call Me Back," who, as sole performer, talked for a solid hour over the phone to his ex-wife, his daughter, a new fiancée, and old friends, in a desperate attempt to keep himself from committing suicide. He will next star in CBS' "Love in America," Oct. 2.

It may not seem possible that in real life he remains naïve, devoid of affectation, and even corny. But I know it's true because I've gotten a rare close-up of him. I observed him during his rehearsals. I sat with him, as he drank cup after cup of black coffee, and asked all kinds of questions. I talked with people who know him.

When I first saw him, I didn't have any trouble spotting him. He was wearing a T-shirt, chino slacks, and loafers. Except that he lacked that memorable vest and hat with its upturned brim, he might have been dressed to step before the TV cameras as Ed Norton, sewer worker and sidekick of Jackie Gleason in "The Honeymooners," the comic role that made him famous and which he played for six years.

I had been warned that it was difficult to get him to talk about himself, that he clammed up if you pressed him—which set him apart from most actors. Somehow I broke the
