Miracle from the Sea: Changing Salt Water to Fresh Water

By HUGO GERNSBACH

ONE OF THE great problems facing humanity this century is our growing shortage of fresh water.

We humans now number nearly three billion. There will be six billion of us sometime in the 1980s—all using water at an unprecedented rate. The scarcity of fresh, potable water, already acute in many parts of the world, could become catastrophic.

Why is abundant water important to you, no matter where you live? It brings down the cost of living, for one thing, because water is used in practically everything you need—whether it is steel, clothing, food, paper stock, your car, or thousands of other items. Cheap, plentiful water affects your pocketbook, and in time becomes a powerful weapon against inflation. And it is a key factor in expanding our economy.

Many of our own states, for instance, cannot live without constant irrigation. Much of our Southwest, such as parts of Arizona, is arid, covered with desert or unproductive land. Yet, with an abundance of fresh water almost any desert can be made to sustain a vast agriculture.

Immense areas of the world—Arabia, Australia, and huge tracts in Asia—also have been nonproducers agriculturally only because they lack fresh water.

Yet deserts that bloom are no novelty. Miami Beach in 1900 was a flat sand-dune strip broiling in a torrid sun. So were Palm Springs, Calif., and other places. They were transformed into luxurious vacation resorts by the magic of fresh water.

Paradoxically, neither the U.S. nor the rest of the world suffers from an actual shortage of fresh water. The great difficulty is that much of this water is often seasonal and ill-distributed. There is a vast quantity of potable water in many parts of the world going to waste in floods, while immense stretches of the earth have a continuous water shortage.

Actually, there is a colossal glut of water
