

Madrid—From nudes to religious paintings in less than a year seems a breath-taking artistic switch.

But American painter Joan (Giovanna) Markson has done just that.

Last winter, the 22-year-old New York-born brush welder shook Madrid with a one-woman show featuring eight nude self-portraits.

The show was a smash success, especially with the men. It attracted the favorable attention of most of the nation's major critics, even though printed reports avoided discussion of the nudes.

Took Final Step

But this month Giovanna who studied in Italy but calls Spain her "artistic home," took the final step in switching from painting herself in the altogether to doing works for the church.

A Giovanna painting of St. Raphael has been hung in a place of honor in the Church of St. Raphael in Cordoba.

The canvas, portraying the city's patron saint, was commissioned by church officials earlier this year.

Miss Markson, the daughter of retired New York businessman and art collector Oscar Markson, used her husband of three months, Spanish Dr. Enrique Alvarez Correal, as model. Giovanna and the doctor were married in Cordoba, which made the whole affair a kind of "old home week."

Pleased Commissioners

The picture which portrays a saint, dedicated San Rafael against a background of Cordoba's famed, 1,000-year-old Arab Mosque, apparently pleased its commissioners.

They took one look and sent off for a special frame "needed to do justice to the painting," according to father Markson.

The frame, made of wood taken from a 17th Century church, was carved and gilded by Cordoba's best craftsmen.

"It is a work of art designed for a work of art," Markson said.

According to critics, the bigger-than-life canvas is a first-rate work of religious art.

Bacteria Viruses May Identify Actinomycetes

Stillwater, Okla. (Science Service)—Scientists now have a plan to use tiny bacterial viruses to identify and classify the slightly larger actinomycetes—the branching, thread-like microbes that produce most of the medically important antibiotics.

Biologists have long debated whether the actinomycetes are more closely related to the true bacteria or to the true molds. Dr. Selman A. Waksman of Rutgers University in New Brunswick, N. J., awarded the Nobel Prize for his work with streptomycin, the antibiotic that actinomycetes are bacteria.

Theory Supported

A research team from the University of Minnesota in Minneapolis has found evidence in support of this theory.

Dr. S. Galen Bradley, D. L. Anderson and L. A. Jones reported to the American Institute of Biological Sciences meeting here that the actinomycetes, like bacteria, are dissolved by lysozyme, an enzyme in egg whites, are killed by antibacterial drugs, but not antifungal drugs, and are attacked by agents resembling viruses of true bacteria.

In addition, related actinomycetes are destroyed by the same virus, and this fact is the basis for a new classification-identification system.

First Two Related

This means that if a single type virus is unleashed on three different types of actinomycetes and attacks only two but not the third, the first two are related.

Thousands of actinomycetes have been isolated in the search for new antibiotics. The naming and grouping of actinomycetes are presently based on color and structure.

There is much confusion under this system, the Minnesota researchers noted.

First, interpretation of color differs among biologists.

Second, the nutritional state and age of the microbes affect color and structure.

The new grouping system, based on the susceptibility of actinomycetes to bacterial viruses, is expected to eliminate a large part of this confusion.

Los Angeles—(Science Service)—By making teeth "momentarily radioactive," scientists have gained more precise knowledge of the structural relationships of tooth components and of the supply lines which help keep teeth healthy.

Dr. Reider F. Sognness, dean and professor of oral biology at the School of Dentistry, University of California, Los Angeles, has reported that injections of radioactively tagged minerals chemically equivalent to those in teeth have made it possible to study in more detail the structural building blocks of enamel and dentin, the chief bone-like substance of teeth.

These radioisotope studies have also elaborated the growth characteristics of these important tooth substances.

Other Knowledge

Other important knowledge has been gained about the relationship of enamel and the saliva that bathes it and the dentin and its tissue fluids within the pulp or "nerve."

Routes of minerals and other vital constituents going to and from teeth have been traced by radioactively tagging them. Intravenously administered radioisotopes are transported from the internal blood supply through dentin and enamel into the surrounding salivary environment. Externally applied isotopes can be transported through enamel and dentin to become concentrated in detectable quantity in internal organs and urine.

The United States in 1957 issued its first nickel-bearing coin—a one cent piece made of an alloy of 88 per cent copper and 12 per cent nickel.
