Nerve Impulses Feed Computer
Endicott, N.Y. — (Science Service) — An electronic computer is being used to compare the behavior of men and the electrical impulses that are a measure of his nerve responses. An International Business Machines corporation 704 computer is also recording nerve responses of crayfish in the hope of applying some of the technique to man's muscle activity.
Dr. William R. Uttal of IBM's Research Laboratory in Yorktown Heights, N.Y., reported on coding mechanisms to the Second IBM Medical Symposium here today.
Dr. Uttal told Science Service that "we are collecting the nerve responses and comparing them with the magnitude estimates reported by the person verbally. Some things correlate and others do not. We are searching for key code variables."
The reason for studying the crayfish, he said, is that it is a convenient and interesting animal, and the pooled nerve responses are similar to the electrophysiological activity recorded from man.
Computers are being used in various types of research involving enormous quantities of data. In a few seconds of experimental time millions of "bits" of information can be recorded.
