Chicken-raisers Have Fly-Killers in Barnyard

It's funny it took us so long to be sure or to find out what some old-time chicken raisers knew many years ago. Possibly the old-timer never put the proverbial two and two together, but the results were satisfactory so he continued the practice, without knowing the value of the experiment.

Neither did the old-timer apparently know that the male chicks were the ones that ate most, or all of the fly larvae. Since then there has been a lapse of many years during which time tons of poison spray have been sprayed on and around chicken yards.

Spray was expensive, as well as posing a certain amount of danger, both to chickens and to humans. Less effective were fly paper, electric flytraps and various other "de-buggers." Unfortunately, around a henyard, even a modern one, there are conditions conducive to the breeding and prevalence of flies.

Cause Discomfort
Besides being germ-carriers, the flies cause no end of discomfort to a laying hen. She just can't do her best at egg production when she has a hundred or so flies buzzing around her head. The egg-producer, of course, is the hen herself, but the man who owns her is tremendously interested in the number of eggs she lays.

The expenditure of large amounts of money for chemical or mechanical bug control, let alone the labor involved, caused the poultry raiser to desire a better and cheaper method of bug control. Then someone noticed that where the were numbers of baby chicks the fly population was noticeably less. Closer observation revealed the startling fact that the baby chicks were busy eating something, always present near the hen-yards, and that something turned out to be fly-larvae and fly-pupae.

Better Than Insecticide
Here, in the form of a baby chick, was an effective fly destroyer that worked constantly, and was safer than any insecticide. Further studies revealed the fact that male chicks were more active, and had a greater appetite for the larvae than the female chicks. Here was an added bonus, for male chicks, being less productive than female chicks, could be bought from the hatchery for a little or nothing.

So, the cycle has almost completed a full turn. Here in this enlightened age suddenly we discover what a few old-timers did a half century ago — that a group of male chicks would destroy more fly larvae and pupae cheaper and quicker than all the poison sprays and mists. Peculiar, that so many things work so effectively and satisfactorily.
