

Campaign May Have Bad Effect On Religion at Home, Abroad

By LOUIS CASSELS
United Press International
Nearly everyone seems to be talking about the impact of religion on the U. S. presidential campaign.
Let's look at the other side of the coin for a change.
What effect will the campaign have on religion?
Some church leaders fear that it may set back, by many years, the most hopeful religious development of our time.
That development is the emergence among Catholics and Protestants of a strong desire for Christian unity.

This so-called "ecumenical movement" (the name comes from a Greek word which means "drawing together") has not resolved the theological differences which separate Catholics and Protestants, and there is no prospect that it will lead to organic reunion within the foreseeable future.
But it has done something else of tremendous importance. It has begun to create a sense of Christian community which transcends honest differences of belief, and makes it possible to discuss those differences in an atmosphere of mutual respect and understanding. For the first time in 400 years, Protestants and Catholics are facing one another as separated brethren rather than as mortal enemies.

The growth in Protestant-Catholic amity has so far been much more evident in Europe than in the United States. But the quest for reconciliation is also under way in this country, and it has made more progress than is generally realized during the past two years.

OTI President Tells Ministers About Institute

Oregon Technical Institute just isn't what you think it is. So stated Dr. Winston Purvine, Klamath Falls, presiding at the monthly meeting of the Ministerial association at the YMCA Tuesday.
Dr. Purvine explained that the school is better known outside of Oregon than inside the state, especially employers of former students.
He said that the institute's curriculum is divided into three groups: mathematics, business accounting, and mechanical arts which is divided into science and mathematics division and mechanics.
Dr. Purvine explained that the institute's program is based on a two and three years course of study. The school is now under the auspices of the state board of higher education.
The speaker said that in recent years there has been a greater demand for graduates than what are available. This is particularly true, he said, of graduates in electronics technology.
One reason for this, the speaker explained, is because OTI requires a wider range of basic subjects for students.
The institute has the most extensive career guidance program of any higher learning institute in the state and has a ratio of 10 students per instructor.
Current enrollment is approximately 800 students of which 350 graduate each year.
Following his talk Dr. Purvine distributed OTI bulletins.
Mrs. H. P. Bosworth Jr., president of the United Nations chapter in Medford, spoke on the UN.

Chamber Asked to Take More Active Interest in Vote

Representatives of the Associated Oregon Industries encouraged Medford Chamber of Commerce members to take a more active interest in elections at Thursday's chamber board of directors meeting.
Chamber of Commerce Manager Don McNeil said it was pointed out that "business leaders in communities are going to have to participate more through elected representatives in government, if we are going to have the kind of government that reflects the type of business climate in which business and industry can grow - the type of climate that would attract other business interests."
McNeil added that the industry representatives alleged that "business thinking doesn't get into many of the (ballot) measures through the fault of business leaders themselves."
Also, he said, it was pointed out that the time to find out how candidates stand on various measures is "now," not after the election.
McNeil said various legislative issues were also discussed at the meeting.
Making the presentation for the Associated Industries were Charles Ogle, assistant to the president; Ivan Congleton, general manager, and Tom Donaca, researcher.
