OF SMITH & MEN

By Jack Smith

(c) 1960 - Times-Mirror Syndicate

En Route to Las Vegas by airplane—I've checked the passenger list and neither Mr. Nixon nor Mr. Kennedy is aboard.

What a blessing. Traveling alone is exciting. One always sits beside a complete stranger. Generally, I draw the most despicable types. I flew all the way to Ft. Worth once with an overweight man who had run for President once on the Prohibition ticket.

This time I have been incredibly lucky. "Would you like to sit here, Mr. Smith?" the Stewardess asked.

She pointed to an empty aisle seat. A young lady was sitting by the window. She was wearing a vermilion dress that barely covered her knees. She had long ash blond hair caught up at the back by a silver clip into a pony tail that fell rakishly down across an ivory neck.

"Do you mind?" I asked. She examined me with exultating calm. Her eyes were large, brown and frank. She shrugged, indicating it was a matter of no concern to her, whether I sat next to her or not.

Her vermilion dress was covered with little yellow flowers. She looked at me again, then lowered her eyelids and smoothed out her skirt with an immaculate hand.

"My name is Gale," she said. "I have wings."

She had the face of an angel, no doubt. But no wings were in sight.

"I see," I said. "Where are your wings?" I asked.

"In my mother's purse," she said. "They're safe there."

"Yes," I said. "I'm sure they are. That's a good place for them."

"The stewardess gave them to me," she explained. "They're gold."

I looked into her eyes. "Your eyes are blue, aren't they?" I said. It's not something I would ordinarily say to a complete stranger, but one must start somewhere.

"Oh, no," she said. "They're brown."

I looked into them again. "Indeed they are," I said.

"All the girls in my family have their eyes brown," she said. "And all the boys have their eyes blue. Isn't that funny?"

"Yes," I said. "It certainly is funny. Is your sister on the plane, too?"

"I don't have any sister," she said. "I only have my big brother and my little brother."

"But you said," I reminded her, "that all the girls in your family had their eyes brown?"

"They do," she said. "My mother and me are the girls. We have three boys. My big brother and my little brother and my father. They have their eyes blue."

"I see," I said. "What does your father do?"

"He lives in Alaska," she said.

"I mean," I explained, "what kind of work does he do?"

"He makes money," she said.

"I see," I said. "Do you know how?"

"No," she said.

A warm, father-like voice came over the loudspeaker. "This is Captain Gumly," it said. "We are now beginning our approach to Las Vegas. Fasten your seat belts, please."

The plane angled downward. Cars and rooftops came into view, flowing rapidly away.

"I'm going down," she said. "We all are," I told her.

Women, especially beautiful women, who have their eyes brown, often think of experience only in terms of themselves.

"I'll bet you're four," I said.

"I'm five," she said. Looking back, I see clearly that she was five. She was much too sophisticated for four.
