The Medical Roundup

by Walter Edgeway, Emeritus Consultant to Medicine, Mayo Clinic. (Register and Tribune Syndicate, 1948)

An Enlarged Heart Need Not Be Bad. People write much alarmed because their doctors told them that their heart is enlarged. They want to know if the enlargement is going to cripple them, or eventually kill them.

In many cases, an enlargement of the heart is a good thing; it is like the enlargement of the arm muscles of the arm muscles of a blacksmith; it was produced by hard work, and it enables the smith to do a better job.

This is why I always used to say to my students, "Cultivate the habit of optimism. If you love to hand out death sentences, you are going to have some very embarrassing experiences, as when year after year the patient whom you condemned keeps running around, perhaps with more pep than you have!"

Another man whose story I have never forgotten had what is known as a fibrillating heart, in which the individual muscle fibers in the walls of the upper chambers of the heart keep quivering separately instead of all contracting in unison.

Years passed, and he refused to die; he would not even become ill! As Dr. Thayer used to say to his students; it was most embarrassing for him because, every morning, he and his neighbor were likely to come out of their front doors about the same time and walk down the street together.
