Cortisone for Bursitis and Arthritis

People ask if they should take cortisone for bursitis, and I can't tell them because I don't know about their particular type of bursitis.

'It Can't Be Hereditary Because My People Are All Normal'

A few hundred times when I have started to hunt for the hereditary cause of some queer nervous or mental disease, manifest in the patient before me, I have been told it could not be hereditary because the family was "normal."

Sometimes persons with a senescent (old person's) type of arthritis in the knees and hips can be greatly helped by injection into the joint of some hydrocortisone, but this must be done by an expert with great care to avoid introducing some infection.

Inborn Lack of Chemical
Any number of puzzling diseases have now been shown to be due to an inborn lack of a chemical known as an enzyme.

Often it looks as if this badly injured child is a

"Sport" who appeared out of a clear sky, but now that the chemical nature of the defect is known, expert chemists can quickly study the parents and uncles and aunts and cousins and brothers and sisters, and among them they will find several who have the defect in so borderline a form that it either does not produce symptoms or it produces only mild and unrecognized ones.
