of the bowel, the ring will grow almost closed, or it will become plugged with a piece of lettuce or fruit skin. Then, the man probably will have to be operated on quickly.

Nowadays, the surgeon often will, first, "decompress" the patient by running a tube down through his nose and stomach into his bowel. By exerting suction on this tube he often will remove the gas and put a stop to the powerful contractions of the bowel which are so distressing and so likely to lead to a state of shock and toxicity.

Greater Recovery Chance. After the patient has been gotten into a good condition, he can be operated on with a much greater chance of recovery than if he had rushed to the operating-room when he came into the hospital.
