

Watch for Them in '61

Some rugged, some glamorous, some new, some veterans — these are the sports and entertainment personalities most likely to stand out during the new year

Professional golf has been waiting a long time for someone to dominate the sport as Ben Hogan did in his heyday. Arnold Palmer's record-breaking year in '60 indicated he might be the man, and 1961 should prove it.

Her recording of "Kookie, Kookie, Lend Me Your Comb" with Edd Byrnes started Connie Stevens off on the right foot, and she hasn't missed a step since. "Parrish" and "Susan Slade" in '61 will add to her burgeoning popularity, and her continuing role in TV's "Hawaiian Eye" guarantees her No. 1 fan-mail rating.

Troy Donahue found himself in "Summer Place," and his career has been rocketing ever since. In '61 he will reach stardom in Warner's "Parrish" and "Susan Slade," in addition to claiming his share of the television audience through his popular "Surfside 6" series.

When Debbie Reynolds signed for a TV spectacular last year, she knew she'd lose money. She figured (correctly), however, that it might beef up her movie career. As a result of her show, she recently signed a three-year, multi-picture contract, including a top part in "Pleasure of His Company" for '61.
