Potpourri

We've been feeling frightfully superior and virtuous. This female can report that she kept a New Year resolution an entire year. We slipped two or three times, but considering everything, we did real well.

A year ago Christmas we had our feelings hurt when the Medford police department sent us a notice saying we owed them $3.50 for overparking fines. Although we were absolutely sure that we didn't owe them any such a thing, we wrote them a check for the sum, accompanied it with a firm letter and vowed that we'd quit parking our car in front of the office.

Now, a whole year later, we can report that we had only three over-parking tickets during the entire year, as compared to an average of about one a week for previous years. Unless our arithmetic is as bad as we sometimes think it is, the city lost about $109 in over-parking fines plus heaven knows how much in "meter feeding" money.

Of course, we had a little help on the deal. For one thing, Pappy has done a lot of chauffeur-ing since the first week in November when Potpourri broke a bone in her right foot and wasn't doing so good as far as walking or driving went. Since Pappy was doing the driving, he didn't park the Doll (otherwise known as the motorized pup tent) by a meter. Which reminds us of something. Several weeks ago when we bragged to Pappy that the traffic department had only stuck us with three over-parking tickets in several months he said "That's nothing, I've never had a ticket for over-parking."

Perhaps we'd better explain that the term "motorized pup tent" isn't original with Potpourri. The two of us read it in a magazine for sports car owners—it was the contemporary term of the owner of a large and expensive American made car who said he was sick and tired of hearing citizens of the United States brag about their foreign sports cars. He hinted that any red-blooded American would buy a good car made in this country. Of course, we presume he wouldn't want to be the one to say that the car manufacturer in this country had to give up all their sales made to Europeans and South Americans, for instance.

We learned long ago that if a country expects to sell to others, it has to buy something in return. And it's a bit difficult sometimes to be economic entities and political friends at the same time.—O.S.
