

Wild but Warm

In a blaze of colors,
Peruvian knitting has gone to the heads of winter sports fans

IF YOU SEE a skier this winter with an orange face, purple eyebrows, and green hair, don't run and tell a natural history museum. You haven't really found the Abominable Snowman.

Chances are the skier is sporting the latest in winter wonderwear, a Peruvian face mask. For years, Indians inhabiting villages high in the Andes Mountains have knitted masks and caps to face up to raging winds and frigid temperatures. They use the brightest colors (see cover) and most fantastic designs they can conjure up.

While on a trip to South America, engineer Stan Sellingut discovered this garish headgear and brought back a few samples as gifts. The response prompted him to import some more, and in a short time they became so popular in the U.S. that Sellingut's firm, Pinata Party, now has an entire Peruvian village busily knitting them.
