Information Important To New Sawdust Uses Obtained in Research

Corvallis — Information important to development of new and improved uses for sawdust and shavings has been obtained by studies at the Oregon Forest Research center in Corvallis.

Distribution of size of particles from various types of saws and planers was determined in a survey of mills in the Willamette valley.

Half the volume of a log remains as residue when it is cut into lumber, according to S. E. Corder, research engineer who directed the study. Uses exist for the 25 per cent of residue that is sawdust and 15 per cent that is planer shavings, but large quantities remain unused. Knowledge of size of particles may aid increased utilization of residues, Corder explained.

Similar distribution of size of particles was obtained with sawdust from band headsaws and band resaws. Circular headsaws produced sawdust of same distribution in size as sawdust made by circular edgers, Corder stated. Saw-found in planer shavings from kiln-dried lumber than were found in shavings from undried lumber, Corder said.

Information on size of particles from mills in the Willamette valley is available from the Forest Research Center upon request.

Studies in milling and engineering at the Research Center are supported by a tax on timber harvested in Oregon.
