Mrs. T. W. — Our son is 5 years old and very bright. [illegible] in age, in [illegible] up [illegible] kindergarten. [illegible] especially because he [illegible] school. I was a stutterer myself, and no one did anything about it until I was in high school. I remember the agony I endured from kids laughing at me, imitating me, and grown-ups getting impatient with me. Even though I was helped, I still stutter sometimes when I'm in a tight spot.

One of the things I learned about this difficulty is that parents can usually prevent it. They must be patient, encourage the child to speak slowly, give him the feeling that he can have all the time in the world and nobody is rushing him.

Instead of cooperating, my husband gets Dickie more wound up and nervous than ever. He interrupts him, hurries him, brings up new subjects while Dickie is struggling to say something. He thinks the child's shining eyes mean everything's swell. All it means is Dickie's given up.

Mr. T. W. — My wife doesn't realize how much she herself stutters. Since she's with Dickie much more than I, naturally most of his speech has been picked up from her.

It isn't nervousness or excitement. It's just imitation. Once Dickie gets to school, he'll imitate his teachers. Another thing that holds him back is his small vocabulary. When I hear him floundering to say "detective" or "astronaut," I help him out. That way he learns new words and, at the same time, realizes I'm speaking to him as though he's a big fellow, not a baby who's just learning to talk.

He's a smart boy and has already started violin lessons. I'm sure the key to improving Dickie's speech lies with his mother. She may need a new course in correction for herself, so that she doesn't slip back so often. Dickie adores her and he copies her. It's hero-worship. I adore her too, but I'm not as impressionable.

The Council: Strangely, stuttering is a speech defect where corrective measures must be directed toward the family rather than the stutterer. As Mrs. W. knows, the trouble is emotional rather than organic. No lip-tooth-tongue-palate exercises are involved.

Clearly, young Dickie is the victim of too much stimulation, too many pressures, and [illegible] about pleasing [illegible]. He feels himself [illegible] with the [illegible] of the [illegible] does get the [illegible] means of communication beyond him. He gets [illegible] with anxiety and can't untangle the [illegible] his throat.

The effect of [illegible] occasional stammering is secondary. Perhaps it inevitably produces Dickie's negative [illegible] his block, by making him see that others get stymied, too.

The stutterer is usually a sensitive, keenly alert person. When he's rushed, tensed up, burdened, he is literally "beyond words." Sympathetic parents, teachers, pals can reverse this paralysis by rolling out the figurative red carpet which says, "Take your time. I know what you'll say will be interesting and worthwhile. Say it at your own pace. We'll wait."

Mr. W. can help Dickie unwind. Violin lessons at age 5 sound like pushing. So does putting big words into the child's mouth, when he's trying valiantly to get out a plain Yes or No. Any lessening of tension which Mr. W. can achieve in the home will have a salutary effect not only upon Dickie's stuttering, but upon Mrs. W.'s, too.

HOW'S THAT?

London — (UPI) — A London art gallery today ran this note on a forthcoming exhibition by a painter named Turcato: "He protects himself from identifying quality with individuality. Individuality is one, and one . . . is undoubtedly the nearest point to quality, but in fact it is only the beginning (as the infinite is the end) of the series of qualities."
