Watercolor Art Exhibit Remains Open at Gallery

A young artist who believes that watercolor is a medium of both strength and flexibility is showing his works at Rogue gallery through February 15. The show, which opened last Sunday, is made up of more than 50 works by Robert Bosworth, Medford, who has been painting since his grade school days and who studied art and architecture at the University of Oregon.

"For years the belief has been prevalent that watercolor is a medium for sketching or only for the beginning artist," Mr. Bosworth states. "I believe that watercolor can be used with both flexibility and expression, that it can be as significant to art as oil works. Watercolor can have as much depth and substance, can communicate as much meaning to the viewer as a work in oil or any other medium."

"I have endeavored to work up a watercolor technique which will convey this strength and substance." The artist was honored at a reception last Sunday evening, and many of those who attended and saw the show agreed that Mr. Bosworth is succeeding in his idea. Some commented on the "exciting" colors and effects he has achieved and confessed that they found the show much more stimulating than they had anticipated watercolors could be.

Reception Given
Preceding the reception, Dr. and Mrs. J. R. Porto and Dr. and Mrs. Harry Danielson honored Mr. and Mrs. Bosworth at a buffet dinner and cocktail party. The event was held at the Danielson home on Siskiyou boulevard.

The reception was sponsored by Richard Courtwright and Mr. and Mrs. Richard Padgham, members of Rogue Valley Art association. Mrs. Padgham and Mrs. William Thorndike, social chairman for the association, poured.

The current show at Rogue gallery, 220 West Main street, is one of several which Mr. Bosworth has had in recent years.

In April 1959 he held a one-man show in Belvedere, Calif., and another in the Eugene Bennett studio here in June of that year. He was one of five local artists to be invited to show his works during a convention of the Oregon Medical society here in the fall of 1959.

Last year he won second prize and an honorable mention in the annual Southern Oregon show held in Grants Pass under the sponsorship of the American Association of University Women, he won a

Preserving Marriages Duty of Court Committee

By WILLIAM E. TANGNEY
United Press International
Trenton, N. J. (UP)—A New Jersey Supreme Court committee on preserving marriages is trying to answer this question: "How do you reach out and get them at the first punch-in-the-nose stage?"

Attorney Morris Hartman, of Newark, the chairman, says the answer may be to give a complaining spouse, in effect, subpoena power to drag the offending mate into conference with a public marriage counselor.

The committee was formed after the high court abandoned an experiment with two counselors, or "masters," who tried to talk couples out of divorce after they already had started legal action.

The masters achieved reconciliation in less than three per cent of the cases, and had no success at all in desertion cases. By the time divorce papers were filed, the rift was too great to bridge.

Hartman and the counselors agree that the great need is for trained advisers available to the public long before the court stage in a marriage spat.

"The doctors, lawyers, clergymen and social workers who do this now are a little bit better than the average relative; they can give you understanding, but not proper guidance," said Hartman.

Can Be Saved
"There's no question that many marriages can be saved if the trouble is caught in time and both husband and wife are brought in to talk with a trained counselor. In Los Angeles, the Jewish Family Service Agency found that 40 per cent of its cases involved the simple problem of how to keep a family budget."

The big trouble with the work of welfare and family agencies, Hartman said, is that they usually get to talk with only one spouse, usually the party not at fault.

In its report next year, Hartman's 15-member committee of prominent judges, lawyers, professors, clergymen and representatives of social agencies will probably recommend some sort of public counseling service with power to bring in the reluctant half of a bickering couple.

The next step will be to ask the legislature for funds and jurisdiction.

"It's like the bills to create public defenders for indigent criminal suspects," said state Sen. Wesley L. Lance, a Republican. "The suspects and the married people are not like the farmers, gasoline dealers or the CIO. They don't form a unit to plead their cause."

Lance says his bill to study the divorce problem moved nowhere a couple of years ago because it didn't get sufficient backing from the New Jersey Bar association. But Hartman, speaking for his profession, said no attorney wants to see the divorce rate continue to rise.

"A woman comes in and says 'my husband doesn't come home nights, he's out with a woman, he gives us less and less money.' What can a lawyer do except look for a case of support?" Hartman says.

Hartman, 53, is a matrimonial specialist with an office in Elizabeth. While he leads the fight for reconciliation services, he must continue to plead divorce cases.

But for Hartman the overriding consideration is the alarming jump in broken marriages in the United States. There are 10 to 15 times as many divorces today as there were 100 years ago.
