

STATEHOUSE SPECIAL

By
Marguerite W. Wright

Don't count on a cut in your state income tax this year.

No sweeping changes in Oregon tax laws affecting the average citizen are likely at this session of the Legislature, unless there is a great public outcry.

A legislative interim committee which included some of Oregon's most responsible and best informed citizens, Republicans and Democrats, after a thorough-going two-year study brought out its recommendations for improvements in tax laws to close loopholes, remedy inequities, and add tax-payers in lower income brackets.

The committee's tax package was shot full of holes in the first four weeks of the session.

Gov. Mark Hatfield, some of the tax interim committee members themselves, and a couple of powerful Democrats in the Senate, are largely responsible for sinking hopes to pass the tax plan.

House and Senate Taxation Committee members who thought they surely would get widespread support for the package, now appear ready to throw up their hands in disgust.

The cornerstone of the interim committee's proposal—a one per cent net receipts tax—may survive yet.

The net receipts concept eliminates dependency exemptions and deductions, except for business deductions. The tax then is figured on a reduced rate schedule. From this a $20 tax credit, or direct subtraction from the tax for each person and for each dependent, is allowed.

"This substitution of a $20 tax credit causes all persons to get the same tax reduction regardless of income," according to the interim committee report.

If favorably reported out of the House Taxation Committee, as seems likely this week, the net receipts tax could pass the House. But it would still face a big hurdle of opposition in the Senate where various other plain and fancy tax notions (such as Sen. Harry Boylvin's (D-Klamath Falls) property tax offset plan) are being bandied about.

But the cut in state income taxes—for which many citizens evidently thought they were voting when they elected Hatfield 2½ years ago—remains in the realm of campaign promises unfulfilled.

If taxes are not the major point of controversy in this session as in past sessions, it will be because there just isn't going to be much tax legislation now.

This is not merely a matter of partisan politics, either.

There still is a bipartisan agreement behind the major tax proposals of the interim committee.

But this has been cancelled out by what some legislators call the action of a few willful men based not so much on partisan as on personal political advantage.

Some legislators use stronger language yet.

They say the governor's reversal on his stand on the proposed 3-cents-a-pack cigarette tax, which he once supported, is a "doublecross."

And they say that the 10 per cent across-the-board tax cut bill introduced by Democratic Sens. Walter Pearson (Portland) and Boyd Overhulse (Medford) is "demagoguery"—designed to capture headlines and the public's imagination while undermining Oregon's already confused tax structure.

Arousing the public's informed and outspoken interest in tax legislation could be a last-resort means by legislators to get favorable action on the interim committee's plan, according to Rep. Victor Atiyeh (R-Portland), one of the committee's members who still wants to fight for these bills.

Atiyeh is sure that once "the public understands the interim committee's sincere, honest, well-thought-out legislation, they will like it."

The problem, he says, is "how to sell our bills, how to dramatize the real benefits to the whole state" in a way the average citizen can see how it fits his own pocketbook.

A businessman himself, Atiyeh explains that the interim tax package is "no cut price sale. It's an honest deal. We are not trying to fool the people or gouge them. And it's our responsibility, as legislators who want to retain the confidence of our citizens in their government, to help our constituents understand what is involved here."

In the Legislature itself, Atiyeh feels, opposition to the tax plan is "mellowing," and public support would result in an income tax program substantially as proposed.

But the public will have to speak up loud and clear.

My interviews with most of the other members of the Senate and House Taxation committees brought these comments and predictions:

Rep. Doug Heider (R-Salem) There will be no tax cut.

The interim committee's recommendation will be reported out by the House Taxation committee, and the final bill to pass the Legislature will be the net receipts income tax bill with many exemptions allowed. A cigarette tax is still possible.

Rep. W. O. (Bun) Kelsay (D-Roseburg) The cigarette tax is a dead issue now because Gov. Hatfield would veto it. The interim committee's bills would have cut taxes for many and would have been a great step forward, but opposition of Senate leaders probably means there will be little or no change in the present law.

Rep. Richard Eymann (D-Mohawk) The tax cut bill introduced into the interim committee's proposals is still possible if legislators can find the fat in the governor's budget and if the state's revenue estimates prove to be low. It may be wise to delay action on the cigarette tax until we find out if revival of this plan (net receipts tax) might work.

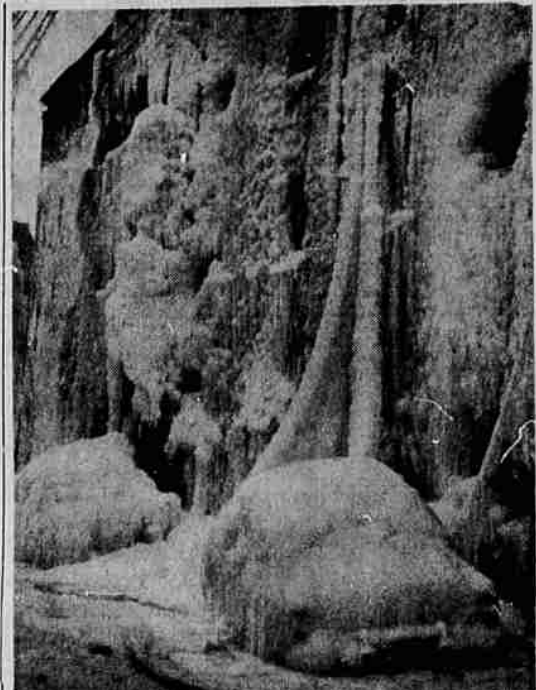

Rep. Bill Bradley (D-Gresham) I see no major change in taxation this session—and no tax cut. There might be a separate bill to repeal the inventory tax and substitute a business tax. A major problem is in coming to agreement about methods of distribution of state tax money to the counties. There is opposition to the business tax plan from professions and businesses which are not now paying inventory tax, and which under the new plan would be paying a tax.

Rep. Clarence Barton (D-Coquille) The net receipts tax plan would be the best long-range tax plan for the state. It would simplify tax filing and records. It would keep in Oregon some of the income tax money that now goes to Washington, D. C. But it appears that it won't get past the Senate Taxation committee without major revisions.

Sen. Anthony Yturri (R-Ontario) Oregon's tax program probably will remain as it is. The only proposed change that now stands a chance of passage is the one per cent net receipts tax.

Sen. Lloyd M. Key (D-Milton-Freewater) The deadlock forming over the interim committee's tax bill was tightened when the governor pulled out of his earlier support of a cigarette tax. Since the present tax program is doing the job of bringing in enough revenue to keep the state government going, and with the hoped-for pick up in the economy due to the Democratic administration in Washington therefore bringing in even more revenue to the state, there appears little chance for change now.

Sen. Vernon Cook (D-Troutdale) The needs of the state preclude a tax cut. No one member of the Senate Taxation committee wholeheartedly supports the interim committee's package. I oppose the net receipts tax, and the cigarette tax. The public would oppose the interim package too, if they understood it: it would give single men and women a tax break and mean more taxes for people with dependents. It just shifts the tax around. But I think the Senate could pass the net receipts tax, retaining the exemptions and deductions we now have. This, however, would not be acceptable to the House Taxation committee. So, we have a stalemate.

ICED AUTOS—Swathed in sheet ice, automobiles and the surrounding area in Philadelphia, Pa., are a chilly reminder of a hot fire there recently. Sprays froze in near-zero temperatures, leaving thick ice long after firemen left the scene. (UPI Telephoto)

This Birthday Party Went Awry

The man with the camera and the idea went to some trouble. He had a special birthday cake baked, complete with fancy lettering, colored frosting and lighted candles. "Happy Birthday" in bright red adorned the cake. Carefully carrying the creation and many pounds of camera equipment, the man entered the city park where a few days before he had observed numerous squirrels eating crumbs left by careless picnic parties.

Ignored the cake. On a sturdy, outdoor table, the man deposited the cake. As busy as bees, several fat squirrels played about the area, each intent on selecting the choicest morsels that lay everywhere in the park. To all appearances the animals paid no attention to the man with the fancy two-layer cake.

The man set up a tripod, anchored it solidly a few feet from the cake. He made an exposure, reading, mounted the camera on the tripod, and set the lens opening and shutter speed. He had measured the exact distance from the camera lens to the cake. He attached a string to the shutter lever, threaded the line through a wire loop placed on the ground.

He planned to carry the other end of the string back, some 50 feet, to a tree where he intended to rest in comfort while he waited for the squirrels to locate the cake.

In a niala photograph (here are usually long waits and often disappointments, but the man had patience. He would be happy to wait while the creatures became familiar with the funny looking contraption atop the silly looking, three-legged tripod.

The final check made by the man seemed to satisfy him. He cocked the shutter carefully, picked up the free end of the cord and walked toward the selected tree. Arriving there he turned for a final look before he adjusted himself comfortably against the tree trunk. He was too late.

The action had begun. Two fat squirrels, teamed up to handle what they knew would be a heavy load, had a firm grip on the birthday cake and were scrambling off the table. Squirrels and cake hit the ground in a crumbly, messy heap. The squirrels quickly disentangled themselves. With a flick of their tails they reorganized, grabbed the broken cake and disappeared into the nearby woods.

The camera stood by the now empty table; the now useless string was still held in the man's hand. The opportunity had come and gone. The man just wasn't ready and had failed to pull the string. He may have imagined he heard a peculiar snicker from the nearby woods from a pair of unseen squirrels who were busy cramming a birthday cake into their little mouths.

Washington—(UPI)—Rep. Thomas G. Morris (D-N.M.) introduced a long-term sugar bill Monday designed to increase the American farmers' share of the domestic market.
