These Legends of Nature Once Were Believed

My grandmother believed that by tying a knot in a handkerchief or her apron that she could stop the hooting of the owls that often made the night hideous with their cries. Her mother believed the same result could be accomplished by turning a pocket wrong side out and wearing it thus for a day.

They believed that if a bee was charmed in a fire and the ashes placed in the shoes, the wearer would be cured of flat feet.

Nature played a very important part to the people of early America. They lived very close to the earth and natural phenomena influenced their lives rather closely.

Many superstitions were built up; their every day lives being influenced by the creatures around them. The actions of birds and animals warned them of coming storms or cold winters. They planted their crops in accordance with natural manifestations. Corn is still planted, even today, in many rural communities, when the oak leaves are as big as squirrel's ears.

When the same squirrel worked assiduously to put aside a heavy store of nuts, the people prepared for a cold winter. The Long "V's" of geese, honking overhead in the dark night, foretold of early cold. The ground hog's Feb. 2 appearance above ground indicated the end of winter, and the time of approaching spring. The first There was also the glass robin confirmed the wood-

Udall Starting Out Washington Career On Risky Maneuver

By A. ROBERT SMITH

Mail Tribune Washington Correspondent

Washington - Secretary of the Interior Stewart Udall is starting his cabinet career with a unique and possibly risky experiment in Washington politics.

His behavior in his first couple of weeks in office would make a political Emily Post blanch.

In both the House and Senate he has been the object of some Republican rebuke for having dared to pick up the telephone and call members of the House to urge that they back Speaker Sam Rayburn's Rules Committee expansion plan.

The static developed when Secretary Udall stood his ground, candidly admitted he had been operating behind the scenes, and said, in effect, "Anyone wants to make something out of it?"

The Republicans then rose to the occasion to suggest that Udall might have clubbed a few congressmen with the idea that unless they voted with Rayburn, local projects in their districts back home might not fare as well as they had hoped.

Congressman Quakes One of the congressmen who was reported to be quaking in his boots was Rep. J. Edgar Chenoweth (R-Colo.), who has been trying in vain for years to get enactment of a bill for the Arkansas-Frying Pan reclamation project in his district. Chenoweth was the congressman who buckled under this same sort of pressure some years ago and defected from the Republican party lineup against the Hells

Canyon bill in the House Interior Committee.

Whatever happened, Chenoweth voted "present" in the rules fight - a neutral stand which helped neither side, as it turned out.

GOP Floor Leader Charles Halleck had a few caustic remarks about Udall's high pressure tactics. Udall, at his news conference, responded to this by saying that Halleck is noted as a gut fighter who plays the game to the hilt, but he doesn't seem to like it when others play to the hilt.

The issue the Republicans were trying to stir up was whether Udall will now dispense or withhold federal projects in the congressional districts of the country in accordance with how the congressmen voted in that close battle which the Kennedy Administration won.

For example, just before Secretary Fred A. Seaton left office he selected a site for a new saline water conversion plant at Wrightsville Beach, N.C. The congressman from this district is Rep. Alton Lennon, a Democrat who failed to support Rayburn.

Selection Reconsidered Udall has now announced that he is reconsidering this selection. He denies that he made any effort to get Lennon to vote with the Administration. The saline water conversion plant may go to Florida instead.

When reporters asked Udall about this, he pulled out a rating sheet which showed the number of points given all cities considered for these projects on both coasts. Out of a possible 1000 points, Wrightsville Beach had 885 and the next highest site in Florida had 880.

It would not be unprecedented to pick the site which failed to rate highest, said Udall. He noted that Seaton passed over two California places - Pt. Hueneme, 895, and Camp Pendleton, 875 - in order to locate the plant at San Diego, which had 825 points. He said Seaton had done this for political reasons.

If a bit of politics gets mixed in with these selections, the only thing new about it is that Udall is candidly admitting it instead of acting according to the usual script which calls for cabinet officers to feign innocence of all such wicked goings-on.

REALLY OLD

Dallas, Tex. - (UPI) - Juanita Armes wrote the Dallas Times Herald Monday complaining about the ancient movies on local television.

"I saw one so old last week that the credits said 'Introducing John Barrymore,'" she wrote.
