Traffic Deaths Up During January

People who like to blame bad weather for traffic deaths this time of year will have a hard time explaining why more people were killed last month than in January a year ago, Chief of Police Charles P. Champlin said today.

Chief Champlin pointed out that the state avoided any general snow and that roads were for the most part in excellent driving condition. Despite this, the tentative death toll for the month hit 34, as compared with 27 in January last year, a month which saw a great deal of inclement weather.

Less than five of those killed last month died in accidents occurring on icy streets or highways.

Champlin said statistics provided him by the Department of Motor Vehicles indicate that 20 of the state's 34 deaths occurred on week ends, including nine who died in the first two days of the New Year, a holiday period.

Medford recorded 48 accidents. Seven people were injured, but no deaths occurred during the month.
