Brazilian Student Talks At Annual AAUW Luncheon

A view of Brazilian education, way of life, and attitudes was given members and guests of Medford branch, American Association of University Women Saturday when Miss Euzi R. Moraes spoke at the annual fellowship luncheon. Miss Moraes, a Fulbright scholar at the University of Oregon, and holder of a grant from the Oregon Federation of Women's Clubs, said "I came to the United States in order to learn English. . . to be filled with the spirit of the language." Although she now thinks in English, as well as her native Portuguese language, she said it would have been easier had she not learned so many grammatical rules.

Since her graduation from college in 1956, Miss Moraes has taught English in high school. She is now on leave from her teaching position in Victoria, the capital of Espirito Santo, the state just north of Rio de Janeiro. Victoria's population is 40,000 or 70,000. She hopes her year of study in this country will help her reveal America and Americans to her students, most of whom won't have the privilege of being here themselves.

Approximately one half of Brazilians are literate, and school is not compulsory because not enough schools and teachers are available. Teachers often work for three or four schools at once. They must have two years experience in rural schools before being hired in urban areas.

Many Languages. Applicants for high school are given competitive examinations. Of a thousand candidates, only two or three hundred are accepted. All students from eleven or twelve years of age are required to study Latin, Portuguese, French, and English, according to Miss Moraes. Requirement of these, plus other subjects such as history, leaves little time for elective subjects such as are available in United States schools. However, in the three years of high school, students are given the choice of classic or scientific courses of study. The lower grades are divided into five years of elementary school and four years which correspond to our junior high schools.

Private schools are more often educational than are the public schools, Miss Moraes said. When asked to compare student attitudes, Miss Moraes said that she is very well-impressed by the attitude of students here, and that they study much harder than do Brazilian college students.

Graduate students in Brazil do not work for advanced degrees as is usual in America. Doctoral degrees are available, but being a college graduate is considered enough. Miss Moraes said the bachelor's degree is earned after three years of college, admission to which is earned by a very hard competitive examination. Most holders of bachelor's degrees take specialized courses for another year.

Discusses Women. Discussing emancipation of women in Brazil, Miss Moraes said that Brazilian men never tire of reminding women that Eve was taken from Adam's rib. Home is considered the place for women, but teaching and other professions are gradually being accepted as suitable for women, too. She stated that wives do not discuss, but ask permission of husbands. "Men are afraid of women who like books," she said.

When Miss Moraes was asked whether there was a Brazilian organization corresponding to AAUW, she said "We do not have as many women's clubs as you do here. A church association is the only one in my home town I know of."

A life-long Presbyterian, Miss Moraes said that 95 per cent of Brazilians are Roman Catholic.

Political changes in Brazil puzzle some and encourage others, but Miss Moraes said the belief is, "The people will honor the broom handed the new president. They are surprised with the firmness of his first acts, and believe he will toss away the label of 'underdeveloped country'."

There are two major political parties, the Social Democrat, and one which supports the working men, but there are many other parties, perhaps ten or fifteen. The new president is not from the major parties, and the people feel he will be "free from strings of the parties which have led."

No Anti-U.S. Feeling

Asked about Brazilian reaction to the Cuban situation, she said that she has felt "no anti-United States feeling in Brazil." She added that there are many differences between Brazil and the Spanish-speaking countries of South America.

In response to a question about the attitude of Brazilians to Brasilia, the extravagant new capital in Brazil's interior, Miss Moraes said there is a feeling of pride in its beauty. Railroads which were built for Brasilia's construction now link northern and southern Brazil, and this is amazing to Brazilians. However the population is divided in belief of the propriety of building such a capital. One group thinks it is a great step for the emancipation of Brazil, while the other group would prefer that Brazil take care of its poor.

Miss Moraes has never paid any tax and is amazed at the universality of taxes in the United States. However, her father, a businessman, complains bitterly about his taxes.

Football is the favorite recreation in Brazil, but she sees little relation between it and American football. Young men and women, Miss Moraes said, often spend their evenings in the town square, where the girls walk around the square and the boys stand around and watch. She said she has been looking in vain for such a square here.

In the five months she has been in the United States, Miss Moraes has been from Seattle to Los Angeles, in June, when she has finished her work at the University of Oregon, she will visit a friend in North Carolina who studied in Brazil, and then travel to Washington, D.C., and New York City before returning home.

Would Live Here

She said "I would be happy to live here if I could bring my mother and father and seven nephews."

At the end of a lengthy question period, Miss Moraes expressed pleasure in the interest shown by Americans in foreigners and their countries. There were many comments among the audience about the excellence of her vocabulary.

Father-Daughter Banquet Given By Scout Troop

In late January the troop visited Sevenson's Candy store, toured the kitchen, and received samples of the products.

If by any chance there should be some reader who is dubious about tourism being big business, here are some figures. According to the Minneapolis Tribune, residents of the United States spent 20 billion dollars last year traveling around their own country, and 2.3 billion dollars traveling in other countries. But—travelers from foreign countries spent barely one-tenth of that sum in this country.

The Minneapolis Tribune thinks its high time that the United States, with a reputation of being able to promote practically anything, starts working on a plan to bring travelers, and their money, to this country.

"Quite frankly," says the Tribune, "this country, both officially and unofficially, has made only a puny effort to attract tourists."

As an example of what can be done, the Minneapolis paper (the article was reprinted in the Christian Science Monitor) told about the undeveloped country of Tunisia. This country, with nothing much to offer but good weather and exotic scenery, has worked up a healthy tourist trade. One of the gimmicks is to organize plane trips throughout the country. Groups are signed up, planes chartered, and after two or three weeks of "doing Tunisia" the travelers return home leaving considerable sums of money behind.

The writer said he believed that Minnesota (and Oregon could do the same thing) should organize such groups and bring them to the United States for fishing, boating, sight-seeing—to attend music and dramatic festivals, to visit relatives and generally enjoy travel in the U.S.

"This may take some cooperative effort between private tourism promoters and the government," said the Minneapolis Tribune. "Visa procedures need to be eased—or abolished. Americans can visit most European countries without visas, so why not vice versa? Government restrictions on travel money need to be negotiated away where they exist overseas."

"But no one can see insuperable difficulties in generating a real tourist flow from Europe to the United States. And if, as the Commerce department says, the average foreign traveler in the U.S. spends $540 exclusive of transportation costs, the potential dividends from such a flow are considerable indeed."

An influx of visitors from foreign countries would have other good results, too. They would not leave only money, but they would make friends, bring new ideas and information, and in general enrich our lives and perhaps introduce a little leavening into some communities and circles which could profit from it. The truth is that many Americans are quite provincial in their outlook, still remain distrustful of individuals from abroad whose language, clothing and customs are different from ours and who believe that those from other nations are somehow a little inferior.

Travis Cross, an assistant to Governor Mark Hatfield and also his press secretary, talked here Monday for Republican women. He said Jackson county Republicans should be "real missionaries" for the party. "Republicans," said Mr. Cross, "have a reputation for fratricide. We chop one another up."

Well, now look. Maybe all Republicans aren't engaged in chopping one another up. Maybe just the Republicans Mr. Cross knows are chopping one another up. But even Mr. Cross said himself at the beginning of his speech that the rumors to the effect that Secretary of State Howell Appling and Governor Hatfield aren't "getting along" were just that—rumors. "Don't take those stories seriously," were his words. He also said that the Democrats in the legislature "aren't speaking to one another." So maybe the Republicans aren't the only ones that have a reputation for fratricide.

And if Mr. Cross thinks that Jackson county Republicans should become "real missionaries" he must believe that we get along down here better than Republicans do in other places. Very interesting. Mr. Cross, very interesting.—O.S.

Almost overnight the tousled hair, the casual sweater and the tight skirt no longer are fashionable. The reign of Mlle. Bardot has ended. Long live Mrs. John F. Kennedy!

You can see a reasonable facsimile of her any place and hour. Models wearing the small hat, the sleek hair-do and the wide eyed look peer at you constantly from the newspapers and fashion magazines.
