Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins
(Register and Tribune Syndicate 1961)

Little Louie Would Sit Up . . . and Up, and Up

The small segment of the world visible to Little Louie, the toy poodle, was streaked, fuzzy and indistinct, for he had to view it through a curtain of curly hair that grew low and long on his forehead, shading his eyes and often completely hiding them. But what little of the world he could see, he liked.

His mistress was very proud of Little Louie, and justifiably so, for when the little poodle was "dressed" in his little fur-trimmed jacket, held in place with a jeweled harness and a fancy leash, and with his colorful little beret perched atop his tiny head, he was charming, chic and as "cute as a bug's ear."

Taught to Sit Up

For his part Little Louie enjoyed his home, his carefully prepared food, and the loving attention of his human associates. Knowing the poodle's natural aptitude for learning tricks, it was decided to teach the little dog to sit up.

The logical way to begin, his owners thought, was to place the dog in a corner of the room. In this manner, he was supported from both sides, giving his back the necessary support. Later he was moved to just a flat wall surface.

The system worked. But somewhere along the "training line," and unknown at the time to his mistress, Little Louie developed either a physical, emotional or a psychological block. He would sit against the wall but for some peculiar reason he either couldn't or wouldn't come back down to the natural horizontal four-point contact with the floor. Placed into position, chucked under his chin, he would be commanded to "sit up." Everyone would laugh and say, "Isn't that just too cute." But Little Louie would stay up.

Not Funny to Him

It was always pretty funny, as far as his human observers were concerned, but not so funny for the little dog. One day, to demonstrate the dog's tricks to a group of visiting club members, his mistress placed Little Louie against the wall, chucked him gently under the chin and told him, "Up." He did. His two forepaws folded in their position of adject supplication under his hairy little chin. His eyes, what could be seen of them, had their characteristic sadness.

Something distracted the attention of his human audience. They left the room, completely forgetting the little upright dog.

Some time later, his mistress found him; he had collapsed to one side. He was exhausted and had fallen over sideways. Poor little guy, he slept for hours, his physical, mental or psychological block still retained within his little self.
