Jets Enter New Stage With Modern Streamlined Styling

Washington-UPI-Commercial aviation is entering the second stage of the Jet Age—featuring the "rear look." New jetliners now under development have their engines attached to the rear of the fuselage instead of in pods suspended under the wings. Rear engine jets are nothing new. The French-built Caravelle, which has been in operation for several years, has such an arrangement. Britain has six jet projects involving the rear-engine design. And Boeing's new short-range jetliner, the 727, will have rear engines. The "rear look" will bring even greater safety and reliability to the Jet Age. Among its advantages: —It permits a "cleaner,"

Air Force Dogs Guard Nation's Missile Secrets

Vandenberg Air Force Base, Calif.—UPI—It was almost like any other close order drill. A sergeant barking orders, demanding — and getting — full attention, instant reaction and uniform movement. Only the troops were dogs. Six German shepherd dogs — trained by the Air Force for sentry duty at this advanced Missile Age base — were lined up beside their handlers inside a screened pen. On command from the sergeant they sat, stayed, heeled to their handlers and lay down. The dogs were among 22 used at this missile base to guard top secret areas. They patrol only at night. With their handlers — they team up one man to one dog — the dogs are affectionate and friendly. With anybody else, they become 80 pounds of concentrated violence, capable of killing even the largest man if they are not pulled off. "Once we've trained dogs," said Airman 2C Bill Joyce, 21, Seattle, Wash., "they are never returned to civilian life. You can't rehabilitate them to be pets."

Train Together Dogs and handlers — all volunteers for the job — train together at an eight-week course at Lackland Air Force Base, Tex. Then they are assigned to a home base where the training continues. "That eight-week course is sort of like grade school," explained Joyce. "Then high school would be when we give the dogs intermediate obedience here. College is what you teach your own dog on your own time." Joyce added after putting his dog, Venus, through her repertoire of special tricks. Venus would roll over, play dead, walk on her back legs, salute, shake hands, and even ride piggy-back on Joyce's shoulders. Moments before she had ripped into another handler — protected by a 60-pound padded suit for the exercise — with frightening fury. Maj. James L. LaForce, in charge of the dog training program here, said that even while on patrol, handlers keep the dogs on a leash until they want them to attack. Although the dogs — bought from private citizens for $100-$150 when about a year old — are trained to be vicious with anyone else, they become closely attached to their handlers. "Once we had a real bad time when one of the boys got sick on patrol," Joyce said. "He passed out and the dog wouldn't leave his side."

State Not Involved In Price Scandals

Salem-UPI-The state of Oregon did not purchase heavy equipment connected with the price-fix scandal involving a number of major electrical firms, Atty. Gen. Robert Y. Thornton said Monday. For this reason, he said, Oregon is not in a position to file civil actions for treble damages under federal antitrust laws. But he said public utility districts and city-owned water plants might find they have a case. Thornton said the equipment involved included switching gears, transformers, generators and the like—all heavy equipment.
