Small Worlds Around Us

By Lynn M. Watkins
(Register and Tribune Syndicate 1981)

Portuguese Man-o-war
And Its Jolly Crew

The story of the Portuguese man-o-war is not a single individual, rather it is a small community of animals; a colony of polyps living together for their mutual good. Each polyp has its own function to perform, for the good of the others. These slightly different animals form the "crew" of this little sailing boat that bobs majestically over the waves of the sea, sailing a prescribed course, and with the ability to come up into the wind, or slack off its "sail" and run with it.

The "sail" of the little ship is a translucent, elongated bladder, filled with gas, and brilliantly colored with blue, purple, or even crimson, tinted delicately with pink, like the edge of a summer sunset.

On clear, sunny days, when the warm waters of tropic seas are calm, thousands of these "sails" can be seen, bobbing gently with the surge of small waves, and drifting with the wind.

Each "sail" is 4 or 6 inches long, standing about the same height above the water's surface. If there are many in sight at a time, a careful observer notices they are not all going the same way. Some may even be quarreling against the wind.

Forgetting for a moment, that the "crew" of the craft is sailing by direction, the unromantic scientist says the Portuguese man-o-war has dropped down the long tentacles that are attached to the under part of the sail and their weight causes the little "ship" to come about.

These tentacles, or streamers, may hang several feet under the animal, and are under direct control of the creature. At their maximum extension they act much the same as a sea-anchor, and
