

Small Gardens Use Dwarf Trees

If you have only a small space for your home orchard, you can still enjoy a wide selection of fruit, by planting dwarf trees, says the American Association of Nurserymen.

Dwarf trees need to be set only ten to 12 feet apart. A space 30 feet square will contain nine dwarf trees with a fruit harvest sufficient for four or five people.

For temperate climates, apples, pears, peaches, plums and cherries provide an across the board selection. In the case of all fruit trees, two varieties of each type of fruit are desirable, and actually necessary when planting plum and cherry trees.

Most dwarf trees will bear the second year so you don't have to wait eight or ten years to get fruit.

Strawberries can be planted between the trees if they are kept cultivated, with bush fruits at one side of the small orchard.

The care of dwarf fruit trees, including spraying, is simple enough, since these sprays annually is usually sufficient - once in early spring, when dormant, just before buds break out; a second time during the later part of flowering period as the fruit begins to set, and then a month or so later.
