Manufacturers of Toy Cars Jealously Protect Style Plans

Detroit – (UPI) – The toy car in the dime store and the $2,500 model on the showroom floor have more in common than design – that's secrecy.

Most people have heard how auto makers guard their new design and styling plans like the gold in Fort Knox.

But it may come as a surprise to learn that the same super secrecy extends to the small plastic toy cars before they are placed on sale.

Authentic Replicas

Many of the toy cars, which often come in kit form for hobbyists, are authentic scale replicas of the latest American standard size and compact makes.

To help the kit makers build the toy cars, Detroit car makers supply complete blueprints and photos of new models long before the cars appear on the market.

The model manufacturers are sworn to secrecy and undertake a mammoth cloak-and-dagger operation to see that no details of the cars leak out.

Toy model workers are psychologically screened and must sign statements not to discuss the secret car designs, even with their families.

Men scaling down the Detroit design and styling plans to 1/87th full size never leave their work unguarded. Outside truck drivers are never allowed inside the plants. Neither are utility meter readers, who must get their reports second hand from company officials.

This FBI-type secrecy is based on toy car makers fear that any leak might quickly be traced to them.

While automotive suppliers are given advance designs for their individual parts, the toy makers are the only people outside the car companies who ever see the full plans months ahead of time.

Revell, Inc., of Venice, Calif., one of the world's largest model makers, says it exercises as much motherly concern over plans for Dodge and other Chrysler Corp. toy cars which it makes as it would over secret designs for the Titan missile.

The HO-gauge toy cars Revell makes cost 49 cents each and are sold in 125,000 department stores, supermarkets, toy and hobby shops around the country.

Altogether, there are about 20 toy car manufacturers in the United States. Last year they sold about 50 million scale model auto kits, according to the Hobby Industry of America.
