Tornado Warning Service Claimed Not Good Enough

Washington—UPI—The chief of the U.S. Weather Bureau said Wednesday that America's tornado warning service isn't good enough.

He said it has "made great strides" in the past seven years and has saved hundreds of lives. He finds this gratifying.

But, said Dr. F. W. Reichelderfer, "the nation should be far from satisfied."

To have a warning service good enough to spot tornadoes as they are born and predict precisely where they will hit, he said, the United States must invest a lot of hard work and money in weather research.

Fuller Use of Tools

He said it also must make fuller use of available modern tools of storm detection such as advanced radar and weather satellites. This is Reichelderfer's tornado season message to the nation.

"We can't be content with meteorological science as it stands today. Forecasting the possibility of one or more isolated tornadoes in an area of 200,000 square miles (the present prediction limit) has been helpful and is showing improvement all the time."

"But it is a far cry from the ability to pinpoint just when and where these dreadful tornadoes will strike."

Program of Research

"It is toward that objective and the further objective of even suppressing or modifying them that we should aim."

"This only can be done through a long range program of fundamental research."

"We know the general conditions that generate instability in the atmosphere, but we must delve into the mystery of what makes a tornado tick."

In addition to pushing scientific research and making greater use of radar and satellites, Reichelderfer said "we must strengthen our communications and continually strive for improved community action."

Bridge Bond Bill Killed on Tie Vote

Salem—UPI—The Ways and Means Committee Wednesday afternoon delivered the coup de grace to the omnibus bridge bond bill, killing it with a tie vote. It had been sent back to Ways and Means by House Speaker Robert B. Duncan.

It would have authorized $7 million for bridges at Albany, Ontario, Oswego and Dayton.
