Where Are They Going?

By Quentin R. Howard

Almost everybody is going somewhere. You might be going to visit a friend across the street, to the mailbox, or to school.

Each of the persons in the first column below was on his way somewhere. Can you match these travelers with the places they are going, which are listed in the column at the right?

Crazy Catch

By Robert Besch

Each player ties one end of a three-foot length of string around a cardboard tube from a roll of wax paper. Fasten a rubber eraser to the other end of the string. Using one hand only, hold the tube and flip the eraser into the air, trying to catch it in the tube. The first player to make three catches is the winner.

Fun File

By M. Hallmer

Clip interesting ideas for things to do—stunts for parties and games to play—from newspapers and magazines, when you come across them. Paste them in a loose-leaf notebook. Classify them according to kind. Your divisions might read something like this: Fun for One or Two; Things to Try Just for Me; Stunts for the Gang; and Games to Make Parties Go With a Bang!

Bus Trip-Up

By Evelyn Pickering

One day Mrs. Porter had a problem for her fifth-graders. She said, "Every day I come to school on the bus. It travels at the same speed each day and always makes the same number of stops. It takes 75 minutes to get to school every day. On Wednesday it takes an hour-and-a-quarter. Do you know why?"

Answer:

same length of time. Seventy-five minutes and an hour-and-a-quarter are the

I was just thinking...

THE TALK at the coffee party wandered from resorts to recipes to Brigitte Bardot.

Don't ask how that happened. You know women.

About that time someone picked up a piece of strudel and said, "You know, I feel awfully sorry for that girl."

"Brigitte Bardot?" someone else asked incredulously.

"Sure," said the strudel muncher. "She has everything, so she tried to commit suicide. It seems fantastic, but I don't really believe it is."

"I know what you mean," said the woman who took cream.

"People who have everything have nothing else to work for."

The women looked around at one another and agreed. "I'd love to go all the places I've always wanted to," said one. "And have a mink coat and all the money I wanted to spend. But I'm not sure I'd be happy."

Another said, "When there's nothing left to want, there's no pleasure left. I guess you always have to have goals, even if you never achieve them. Maybe it's better if you never do."

"I'd rather not be rich and famous," said another. "When you can buy anything you want, you stop wanting anything."

The guest of honor crumbled a cookie on her plate.

"This conversation reminds me of a story," she said hesitantly. She was the neighborhood newcomer, so she chose her words carefully.

"Maybe you've heard it, but it applies.

"A man died and, after death, he had everything he'd ever wanted in life. All that he'd dreamed of was his to enjoy. And he did, for a while. Finally there was no challenge any longer. There was nothing to desire. So he called in the caretaker and said, 'Frankly, I'm bored. I just can't stand so much of everything any more. I never knew heaven would be like this.'

"The caretaker looked at him and smiled. Then he said, 'I thought you knew. This isn't heaven.'"
