

Lenten Message

Inner World of Faith
Lights World's Darkness

Revive our faith! Let the sepulchres of our despair be opened. Let darkness pass; let dread be left behind! Let weeping be turned into joy and lamentation into singing! This is the Easter message. May we examine our way of life with this message. When the outer world grows dark with doubt, the message of Easter tells us that it can still be lighted by the inner world of faith and hope.

The group in the darkness of human speculation and materialistic philosophy is to go deeper into the darkness. To look up is to find the light that never fails. We then walk with assurance. Treasures await those who have the faith and courage to follow on and possess them. The man who believes is the man who accomplishes. Faith is the tuning fork that brings singing into our hearts, the music of heavenly assurance that Jesus Christ, through his atoning death, is ours; and that we are saved through His precious blood; and evermore kept in His power.

Grain Storage
Program Studied

Washington — UPI — Sen. John L. McClellan (D-Ark.) said Tuesday he is checking to determine whether there should be a congressional investigation of "certain alleged improprieties" in the Agriculture department's grain storage program.

McClellan, chairman of the Senate Permanent Investigations subcommittee, said he was looking into the case of Texas farm magnate Billie Sol Estes. If his preliminary findings indicate it is necessary, McClellan said, his subcommittee will conduct a full-fledged investigation.

The symbol of the 1964 World's fair at New York's Flushing Meadows is to be a huge open-work globe of stainless steel. Its official name will be known as a Unisphere.

FORCES AGAINST ANOTHER INFLATION

Now that the steel industry's efforts to raise prices have collapsed, let's put emotions aside and say flatly that even if the price hike had stuck, it hardly could have set off another inflation spiral in view of the following background:

(1) Competition to U. S. steelmakers from foreign importers of the metal—as well as competition to U. S. businessmen from foreign manufacturers of thousands of other products—is the greatest in modern times. The steel being offered by Europe's highly skilled manufacturers operating the most modern plants in the world is top-quality stuff and attractively priced. The competition will get heavier, not lighter. There is no reason why U. S. users of steel have to stick to U. S. makers of steel if they can get the metal they want at lower price elsewhere and this goes for users of steel the world over.

(2) In factories throughout the nation, there is more than ample capacity to produce to satisfy demands. Our corporations are not being pressured by an avalanche of buying orders to build new plants which would eat up immense quantities of steel. The problem in many industries is too little, not too much demand—scarcely a background stimulating across-the-board price hikes.

(3) There are no shortages—not of raw materials, not of manpower, not of finished goods, not of anything. Prices of most raw materials are way down from their postwar highs. The challenge in many countries producing raw materials has been holding a floor under prices, not maintaining a ceiling. In our country, unemployment is among our toughest problems. Again, this is scarcely a background for an inflation spiral.

(4) The U. S. consuming public isn't hungry. The demands pent up through years of global war have long since been filled, the markets have caught up with customers. Fewer families feel the need to scramble for goods, far more families than ever before have the discretion to decide whether they'll buy to the limit of their paychecks or save big chunks and how they'll spend their money. America's consumers have the cash and credit to buy the sort of things which make an all-out boom but they haven't been doing so on a big scale in the past few years. And they definitely wouldn't if prices jump.

(5) All of us have become acutely aware of the rising flood of quality imports at intriguing prices. Unless U. S.-made goods remain at least steady in price, the tendency of millions of consumers would be to choose the imported products instead.

In short, the basic forces which have created the first prolonged period of price stability in the postwar period would have continued as they were—even if steel had gotten away with it.

Not even steel—leading industry of our land though it is—could have offset these forces, particularly the enormous and growing influence of heightened competition at home and abroad. Steel's price boosts didn't stick—and a lot of price boosts which may be attempted in other industries won't stick either.

"Perhaps by losing so spectacularly on the price boost, Big Steel actually has helped put the price problem behind us, just as by signing a non-inflationary wage pact, the steel union has helped put the wage problem behind us," said one informed source. "Now we can get back to concentrating on the fundamental task of stimulating the economy's growth and reducing unemployment."

Would there have been no danger in the price rise, then? Yes, there would have been—in the impact it might have had on the psychology of buyers and union leaders.

Enormous damages will be done if inflation psychology does take hold again in coming months and if it does stimulate another price upswing. For that upswing could only be temporary and it could only lead us right into the next recession.

Prolonged recession—not prolonged inflation—was the real threat inherent in the steel industry's action. More on this tomorrow.
