Planning Grants Received by UO For Ashland, GP

Eugene - Two new grants have been received by the bureau of municipal research and service at the University of Oregon for urban planning in a number of Oregon communities, according to Herman Kehrli, bureau director.

This brings to more than $1 million the funds which have been available for the bureau's federal urban planning assistance program since it was initiated in 1956.

One of the new grants, totaling $63,150, will be used for additional planning work in Ashland, Canby, Corvallis, Grants Pass, Roseburg, and Scappoose and for the beginning of planning work in Columbia county and Winston.

Of this sum, $42,100 has been granted by the U.S. Housing and Home Finance Agency with the remainder coming in cash and services from the individual communities.

The second grant of $51,600 has been given for a study of Jackson county, with $34,400 coming from the HHA and the remainder from the county and the cities of Ashland and Medford.

The exact total in money and services from local and federal sources devoted to the Bureau's program now stands at $1,005,724, according to Kehrli. Of this sum, $546,697 has come from the federal government, and the communities have contributed $459,027.

Conducted by Bureau

The funds are administered and the studies conducted on behalf of the communities by the bureau, Kehrli explained.

The studies include physical characteristics of an area, existing and potential land use, neighborhood development, population trends, economic conditions, traffic circulation, and other urban problems.

Since the program began, the bureau has conducted some 25 projects involving more than 50 communities and including nine county-wide, regional, and metropolitan studies.

Colonel Emmens Plans To Attend Reunion of 45 Doolittle Raiders

Col. Robert G. Emmens, former Medford resident, who was a member of the Gen. James H. Doolittle raid on Tokyo in April, 1942, will be one of the 45 Doolittle raiders who plans to participate in a reunion observing the twentieth anniversary of the raid.

They will be guests of the General's club, the Santa Monica club, Del Mar, this week end.

The colonel is a son of Mrs. J. J. Emmens, 1445 East Main St., Medford. He now is stationed as commander of the 20th OSI district with the Air Force.

Mrs. Robert G. Emmens is the former Miss Justine Miller of Medford. They have three children, Thomas, Robin and Michael.

Has Many Memories

Colonel Emmens has many memories of the raid which began April 18, 1942.

"Everyone was highly excited prior to the take-off," according to the colonel, which was accomplished without incident, even though the sea was rough and the Hornet's flight deck was small.

Each of the B-25's were given specific targets to hit. Colonel Emmens' aircraft, on which he was the copilot, was assigned to hit the Japan Steel mill complex in Tokyo.

"I remember on the way in to our target, we listened to a baseball game on a Tokyo radio station, almost up to the time we dropped our bombs," Colonel Emmens said. "We encountered no opposition at all."

Faces Decision

After they dropped their four 100 pound bombs, the crew of the plane was faced with a decision which was to effect the life of Colonel Emmens and the crew for the next 15 months.

They had taken off from the Hornet 36 hours ahead of schedule because a Japanese boat had sighted them and they were sure that the boat had radioed their position to Japan. Because of the additional distance they had flown, they were low on gas and felt they were unable to reach the China mainland as planned.

The crew decided to land in Russia which was the closest land they could reach with their limited gas supply.

In doing so, they became the only B-25 from the raid which landed with its wheels down. The rest of the B-25's crash landed on the Chinese mainland.

Crew Interned

After landing at Vladivostok, the crew was interned by the Russians. (Russia and Japan were not at war at that time).

When asked how they were treated by the Russians, Colonel Emmens said, "We were treated with guarded indifference." They were moved from place to place throughout their internment. At one point, he remembers they were in Siberia for about

"SELFISH WITH MANURE"

Hong Kong—"The brigade leader called the whole village together to lecture us about being 'selfish with manure.' But what do you expect? When the ration is so low, and life depends on what we grow on our private plots, who will give fertilizer to the fields belonging to the commune?"

The speaker was a Chinese farmer. He was workworn at 35 years old, but he was also one of the shrewdest and least hunger-deadened of the 40-odd newly arrived refugees from the Communist mainland whom I have now interrogated here and in Macao.

It will seem insanely odd to most Westerners, but it is also a fact that the fate of the most numerous nation on earth may perhaps depend on the peculiar problem this farmer so bluntly summed up. The plain truth is that the Chinese peasants themselves are, and have always been, the main source of fertilizer for the Chinese land. Their "selfishness with manure" certainly hard to prevent, even for an iron police state can be desperately damaging.

THE establishment of the farm communes plunged the Chinese countryside into such misery that the almighty state was finally forced to concede private lots to the peasantry. The purpose of giving each peasant a few square yards of the poorer land to till on his own time was to supplement the seriously low rural diet.

Even so, as already reported in this space, the level of nourishment of the Chinese masses still remains frightfully low. An undoubtedly reliable and scientific computation of refugee evidence gives 1300 to 1600 calories per day, according to labor category, as the total average food intake of Chinese workers at the present time. This includes the produce of the private plots.

As the officially provided ration is so inadequate, it is natural for the peasants to be "selfish with manure," in order to expand production on their tiny private plots to the very utmost. But persistent peasant "selfishness with manure" is highly likely to lead to a further drop in the already unsatisfactory output of the far more important commune-land.

IF OUTPUT on the commune-land drops for this reason, the ration must also be reduced. A net drop in the masses' food intake will then result from the concentration of China's immemorially most valuable fertilizer on these private plots, which were originally intended to bolster food intake. We have here, in short, the quite probable beginning of a vicious circle.

Ignorant people may be amused or shocked by this solemn disquisition on the location of human manure in China. But anyone with the smallest acquaintance with the Chinese countryside will recognize the deadly seriousness of the problem. It is one of several problems that suggest the possibility already mentioned in this space, that Communist China is now caught in a remorseless descending spiral.

Another such problem is simply the physical condition of the Chinese masses. On 1300 to 1600 calories a day, people do not die of starvation, as they would in an acute famine. But even the hardy and resistant Chinese are enfeebled by this low level of nourishment. And men and women weakened by hunger do not make good field hands.

THE point cannot be finally proven. Yet on the face of the known facts, it is logical to suppose that the physical condition of the rural population had much more to do with the poor harvests of the last three years than the "natural calamities" blamed by the Peking leadership. In truth, the sole clearly identifiable natural calamity in this whole three-year period was the bad weather which cut in half the north Chinese winter wheat harvest of 1961.

But if the poor physical condition of the rural population was a main cause of these three poor harvests, what of the crucial harvest this year? A shrinking number of the expert China watchers continue to say, "Give them one bumper crop, and then see what the Chinese Communists can do." But even if nature is generous, will a bumper crop be produced by hunger-weakened peasants with no incentive to work hard except on their little private plots?

Wherever the many thinks in the bamboo curtain permit a clear view of Chinese Communist realities, you find that the realities are desperately harsh. Communist China today combines a shockingly low level of nourishment for the masses, with persistently poor agricultural production and an acute industrial breakdown.

SUCH is the result to date of Mao Tse-tung's attempt to carry out the rapid forced industrialization of China by the inhuman method successfully used by Josef Stalin in Russia. No wonder Nikita S. Khrushchev flagrantly intervened in Mao's internal party affairs in 1959, in order to secure an early reversal of the "great leap forward" policy.

Khrushchev failed and Mao's policy produced the existing, potentially catastrophic state of affairs in China. In this reporter's opinion, the odds are therefore at least 5 to 1 that Communist China today is indeed caught in a descending spiral. But such a spiral cannot go downward indefinitely without producing a violent result.

Thus the question for China today is: which of the possible kinds of violent result is now the most likely?
