Mandatory Appeal On Death Verdicts Lauded by Gladden

By DOUGLAS GRIPP

Salem—(UPI)—Warden Clarence T. Gladden said today the law which requires an appeal to the state supreme court of every death sentence in Oregon is a good one.

Under the 1955 state law, all condemned persons get an appeal to the high court whether they want it or not.

This, Gladden said in an interview, provides a complete and final judicial determination as to whether a capital offender should be executed.

One of the sponsors of the 1955 law was State Sen. Mark Hatfield (R-Salem), now the governor.

Three automatic appeals are in the high court now. Sentenced to death and in Gladden's custody are convicted slayers Lee Roy Sanford McGahuey, 44; Jeannette June Freeman, 20, and Larry West Shipley, 20.

McGahuey and Miss Freeman were accused of killing children and Shipley shot a teen-age girl, all last year.

If any of them die in the Oregon gas chamber, it will be the first execution here since 1953, and the 58th since the state took executions away from the counties in 1903. The complaint in 1903 was that county executions were drawing large crowds.

Gladden, a tall man with gray steel-colored hair and a voice like churning gravel, has stated various times publicly that he personally opposes capital punishment. But he revealed that until about 12 years ago, he was a strong advocate of the death penalty.

While in more than 35 years of penal service he has never gassed, shot, hung or electrocuted anyone, he attended the hangings of two murderers at California's Folsom prison in the 1920s. He began his career at Folsom, near Sacramento, as a guard.

What changed his personal outlook on capital punishment?

Gladden said those without money or power seem to pay with their lives every time—and not because they are guiltier than rich offenders.

Gladden, who has been the warden here since April, 1953, also feels that one argument for the death penalty is that the "natural will to live" is at least some deterrent to potential capital offenders.

The last person to be executed in Oregon was Albert W. Karpis, 24, who killed a Salem woman during a robbery. He was executed on Jan. 30, 1953. Sixteen others preceded him in the gas chamber here and before that Oregon had 40 hangings.

In 1957 Gov. Robert D. Holmes gave wife slayer George Sack, Portland, and James Norman Jensen, Medford hatchet slayer, from the gas chamber by commuting their death sentences to life.

Gov. Hatfield hasn't yet had to face the burden of whether to grant a reprieve or commute.

McGahuey's appeal was heard by the high court April 9, and the Freeman and Shipley appeals are expected to be heard by July. If the court upholds any or all of the death sentences, one or more execution dates could be set before the year is out.
