You'll Find No Animals On 'Most Wanted' List

What Will Rogers said of people, we can truthfully say of animals: you will never meet a single one that is inherently bad; not a one but what we should like.

If, in all the animal kingdom there could be an exception to this, it would be only a single species—the common rat; this one really is a gangster.

Leaving the rat out, all other animal species show a marked measure of consideration and even respect for others. Somewhat more than can be expected of the human animal.

They Don't Know

Animals never go around with a chip on their shoulder, as do so many people. There are some misinformed folks who, in trying to say something derogatory about someone else, say, "he acts like an animal."

Those folks who think or say this, just don't know what they are talking about. If you want to say something with more meaning you should say, "he acts just like a human."

Another favorite meaningless expression is, "He's reduced to the level of the beast." This is supposed to be violently degrading, but the saying falls flat on its grammatical face when applied to animal actions. Just think about it a minute: have you ever been robbed, gypped, cheated, insulted, mistreated or even pushed around by a so-called "lower beast?"

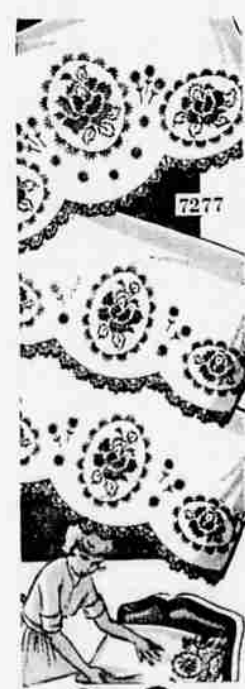

Of course you haven't. There isn't an animal in the world that would deliberately take advantage of you or anyone else.

One important reason we so often belittle animals is the profit angle. Many of us have no use for anything or any one who yields no monetary advantage. He who sells ready-to-wear clothes can't make a sale to the already well-dressed bird. Rabbits don't buy refrigerators.

"No Sale" Aspirin tablets are of no use to the wild creatures. Squirrels will never wear a wrist watch or a pair of earrings. Profitwise, all these things register only a "no sale" on the cash register.

Look over carefully some time the list of "most wanted criminals, those enemies still at large"—who have so far escaped the clutches of the law. The list changes from time to time, but you'll notice it only lists people.
