Exploiting of Ear Muscles May Curb Damage To Hearing

By DELOS SMITH WPI Science Editor

New York - (UPI) - A promising new avenue of scientific research is aimed at exploiting ear muscles which most people don't know they have.

These are not the muscles which some people learn to control enough to wiggle their ears. They cannot be used at will by anyone because they're reflexive muscles of the middle ear, the good old tensor tympani and stapedius.

When they contract they cut down the amount of noise which is transmitted from the eardrum across the middle ear to the inner ear. It is the latter unit of hearing which gets damaged by being bombarded by much noise for a long time.

They contract by reflex action and it takes noise to set off the reflex. Thus they've always served to protect the sense of hearing, but in the modern world the big noises can come too suddenly to permit them to work.

Almost Instant According to Dr. John L. Fletcher, who is pursuing this research, it takes nine-millionths of a second for a noise to flex them into contracting.

When the noise hits them at a higher velocity - that is, the noise is ultimate of suddenness - it goes right through to the inner ear unimpeded.

There are many such noises these days, especially in industry and in rocketry and jet-propelled supersonic aircraft. But Dr. Fletcher's experimental noises were those of gunfire, since he works in the Army Medical Research Laboratory at Fort Knox, Ky.

Whether the inner ear is damaged by noise depends upon the intensity of the noise which reaches it. His research so far has demonstrated that the intensity of the noise which will flex the muscles into contracting is much less than that likely to damage the sense of hearing.

Therefore, in noisy surroundings where the noises are explosive in their suddenness (the cited vicinity of industrial stamping machines as an example) an intermittent but steadily maintained lesser noise will keep the muscles contracted and thus cut down the intensity of the big noises.

This noise could be a pulsed clicking, he suggested in a preliminary report on his research to the Acoustical Society of America. It would have to be fairly loud to act on the muscles but the loudness would do no physical

DEBT LIMIT NO LIMIT ON DEBT As a limit on the growth of our Federal Government's debt, the U.S. debt limit is a massive failure.

Only a few weeks ago, Congress raised the debt ceiling "temporarily" to $300 billion because it had no tolerable alternative except to lift it back to this record established at the height of World War II. The Treasury was running a deficit, it had to borrow billions to pay for the spending program authorized by Congress itself, the debt was piling against the ceiling then in effect, a piercing of the legal ceiling would have created an unthinkable financial crisis - and so Congress had to hike the limit.

Before midnight June 30, Congress will have to raise the ceiling "temporarily" again, because once more, it will have no tolerable alternative. If it doesn't do this, the ceiling will revert to the "permanent" maximum of $285 billion, and with the debt slated to total around $297 billion at June ends, part of our government's debt then would be "illegal".

The ramifications that could result from this - for instance, a successful challenge in the courts of the legality of billions of dollars of U.S. debt, national default - defy the imagination. So Congress will have to go along. Before it adjourns, Congress will have to boost the limit to above $300 billion, an all-time high in war or peace. In July-August, the Treasury will be borrowing around $5 billion, in September-October it will be borrowing another $5 billion. These borrowings are minimum, are certain, will come, I repeat, on top of a debt already around $297 billion. The totals will be swelled as the year rolls on and a deficit in the budget for fiscal 1963 is piled on top of the $7 billion or so budget deficit with which we're winding up fiscal year 1962.

So the ceiling will be raised - to the accompaniment of loud cries and bitter condemnation from Virginia's Democratic Senator Harry Byrd whose nickname is "Mr. Debt Limit." Year after year, Byrd has used Administration requests for increases in the debt limit to denounce the trend toward ever bigger budgets and debt. He's set to do it again. But he'll get no farther this time than he has in the past for as Byrd admitted when he went along with the bills this past March, "Failure of this government to pay its bills would create chaos at home and abroad in the free world."

The plain fact is that the spending programs which will pierce the debt ceiling are now being authorized by Congress. The Treasury has the responsibility to raise the money to finance the programs. Collecting taxes is one way it can get the money needed. Borrowing and piling up debt is the other way. No matter what the debt ceiling, that's the way it is. Period.

With minor and rare interruptions, up and up has gone the national debt ceiling since 1918, when it was initially placed at $28 billion. It is now at $300 billion, the World War II peak. Soon this record will be smashed and Kennedy earlier this year indicated he would like a new ceiling of $308 billion. Here's the story since 1954, in billions.

Table with columns: Year-President, Permanent ceiling, Temporary ceiling. Rows include 1954-Truman, 1955-Eisenhower, 1956-Eisenhower, 1958-Eisenhower, 1959-Eisenhower, 1960-Eisenhower, 1961-Kennedy, 1962-Kennedy.

Debt ceilings are traditional, widespread throughout the world, a symbol of restraint on a government's power to build up debt. But any limit which must be raised eight times in eight years is hardly a real limit - and the ninth rise in eight years is on the way.

Better Times Due, Castro Tells People Havana - (UPI) - Premier Fidel Castro told the people of shortage-plagued Cuba Sunday that things would be better in 10 or 20 years.
