

PROPOSED CIVIC CENTER-AUDITORIUM
—The architects' sketch above shows the multi-purpose civic center-auditorium proposed by the Seaside Junior Chamber of Commerce for that coastal city. It is of a design which has interested some auditorium backers in the Medford area. Designed by Architects Wicks and Brown, Astoria, it would cost an estimated $700,000, and contain a number of facilities, including kitchen...

Dedicated Americans Should Study Russians

New York—A vaguely familiar melody broke forth over the Moscow radio. The Soviet soprano sang in Russian, "Ya neysh mogoo skabat neyt." Ears and eyebrows lifted around the world.

For the words were "I can't say no" and the tune was straight from the Broadway musical "Oklahoma!" This Broadway's first break on Moscow radio. A new era in Soviet life was about to begin.

Aline Mosby, a Missoula, Mont., girl who spent three years in Moscow as a foreign correspondent, recalls this turning point of Kremlin policy in a new book.

It was the spring of 1959 and the Kremlin had just opened its doors to Britain's Prime Minister Harold Macmillan. Within a few months Richard M. Nixon was to follow and with him the great American exhibition.

After four decades of conditioning by Communist-controlled press and radio, the average Russian saw American people and products for the first time—lipsticks and pointed-toe shoes and pretty hairstyles and Billy Graham and Gary Cooper.

"The impact of that exhibition was immediate, and it is still having its effects on the Russian people," Miss Mosby writes in "The View from No. 13 People's Street." The title is taken from her assignment with United Press International in Moscow.

"People's Street" is not like most expert books on the Soviet Union. It is not a glib travelogue. Nor is it a deep analysis of the thinking of Soviet leaders. It is more fundamental than either—a study of ordinary folks in Russia and their apparently rising influence over the party-directed "dictatorship of the proletariat."

Miss Mosby recalls the comment of one Soviet mother whom she had asked, "what do the Russian people want?"

Wants Dacha
"I want a dacha (country house) with a yard for my children," the mother replied. "Isn't it wonderful that this is what we desire, instead of a world revolution as my mother wanted?"

There was the elation of a minor Communist official who had just been given an apartment in Kiev after spending most of his life in crowded, shared quarters.

"Here I am almost fifty, and only now I feel that I'm beginning to live..." he said. "Now to have a toilet of my own! It was sharing the bathroom and lavatory with other people, that's what I hated!"

Miss Mosby underscores the rising power of the Soviet "electorate" when she reports that the planners felt they had to provide, for modern beauty parlors and pointed-toe shoes and lipstick after the Soviet woman had her first look at western charm.

And the exploding demand for housing and consumer goods (which the Soviet leaders admittedly are working to meet) is important in that the more better Russia produces, the less resources it can devote to guns.

As a good newspaperwoman, Miss Mosby lets the Russians speak for themselves. One of her few judgments, however, is a significant one. As she was taken for her first drive across Moscow in February of 1959, she looked at the crowds and uttered: "Why, they're people."

Warns
And if she portrays these people as fairly typical human beings devoted to family and self-betterment, she warns against mistaking the determination of the communists who lead them.

"... the Marxist-Leninist club still is in business, and the Bolsheviks still are pushing their international membership drive," Miss Mosby writes. "As long as this country adheres to its driving expansive philosophy, the non-communist world will be in conflict or competition with Soviet Russia in one form or another in virtually every field."
