Conducted Tours To Greenland Started in 1960

By RALPH VILLERS
United Press International

Viewed from an airliner, gigantic Greenland is one of the most awesome sights a traveler can view—ice stretching infinitely snow-topped peaks with wrinkled glaciers oozing seaward and ragged clumps of icebergs drifting offshore.

Until two years ago about the only way to see this second biggest island in the world was in a plane on a polar flight or to join the Air Force and ask to be shipped to the far nothern base of Thule.

In 1960, the first beginnings of commercial tourism entered the picture with a few conducted tours to the south of Greenland. They were successful enough that they were arranged last year and scheduled again for this summer.

"There's no Waldorf-Astoria there," laughed Axel Dessau, director of the Danish National Travel Office in New York. "It is strictly for people who are out for adventure."

Not Pampered

Dessau wasn't being in the least disloyal to the tours' sponsor (Aero-Lloyd) in Copenhagen. Descriptive pamphlets of the 16-day tour by air and small vessels emphasize it "will not satisfy pampered tourists expecting luxurious rooms."

Travelers are told to bring their own sleeping bags as well as knife, fork and spoon, plus clothing appropriate to the brief summer in a latitude from 60 to 70 degrees North. Hotels are few and for much of the trip accommodations are in the homes of hospitable Greenlanders who might have different ideas about summer heating than visitors.

Tourists frequently take to boats to reach the little towns and points of interest along the fjord-punctuated shore. The scenery is billed as the biggest attraction—but there's the chance to meet close-up the emerging and friendly Greenlanders, who are among the least known people in the world and to see the foundations of a history dating back 1,000 years when the Vikings settled there.

One of the points of all in the Kagassiarssuq area is the ruins of the home of Eric the Red, dating back to the 10th Century, and of the first church built in Greenland.

Visit Ice Cap

A visit to the never-melting ice cape is included.

But Greenland is not all ice and snow. During the short summer the snow gives way to cultivated fields, pastures and even flowers around the tiny coastal hamlets.

Although the chief tours are to the south, it may be possible again this year to go farther north (to about 70 degrees) to the Disko Bay area, visiting villages, seeing the fjords close-up—and for added fishing.

Dessau claims "more fish there than in any part of the world" for Greenland.

For the mindful American, there might be one seeming drawback. You can't get there from here. But you can get to Greenland via Denmark, flying in DC6's from Copenhagen to Narssarssuaq, the one-time U.S. Air Force base known as BW-1, in nine hours.

All-inclusive prices from Copenhagen, including meals, lodging, transportation and necessary incidentals start about $300 and range to about $735, according to Dessau.

Families Discover Boating Is Fun

"Port" and "starboard" are well on their way to becoming as common household terms as peanut butter and jelly. As more and more families discover the fun of boating, even tiny tots are as much at home on the water as in the family car.

Once thought of as a rich man's pasti boating fun is now open to all families, regardless of income. According to the National Association of Engine and Boat Manufacturers, a national boating information group, more than 35,000,000 people took part in some form of recreational boating last year. From all indications, even greater numbers will go abboard in 1962.

To meet the increased demand for boating facilities - federal, state and local governmental units are cooperating to develop new facilities. Mooring areas are being enlarged, launching ramps are being constructed and picnic and camp areas along rivers and on lakes are being improved to give boating families maximum use of priceless natural resources.

Three in five American workers go to work in automobiles, one in eight uses public transportation and one in 10 walks to work.
