Bosc Reported To Be Dropping Too Much, Cordy Says

Pears from the Bosc variety trees are dropping too much in some orchards, County Horticultural Agent Clifford B. Cordy reported this week.

The Bartlett variety trees particularly need thinning, he said. The size situation is bad. Orchardists who thin should thin more severely than in the past, he said. All culls and little fruit should be removed, allowing 40 to 50 leaves per fruit.

"Earlier tests showed that 30 leaves should be left per fruit for commercial sizes. This has been increased to 40 because of size trouble," Cordy said.

Peach Thinning

Peach growers should be thinning now, Cordy said.

"Ordinarily growers thinning peach trees should look to see how much the limb can easily carry when the fruit is mature. Peaches should be 8 to 10 inches apart on limbs," he said.

Orchardists should be sure the weight is off the tips of the branches, Cordy said. This means peaches hanging from the bottoms of the limbs.

Thinners should allow 25 to 30 leaves on peaches. As with pears, growers need to count leaves to get an idea what the small branch will hold.
